It is convenient, we might even say necessary, to represent the passage of light through an optical system in the form of rays (or straight lines in diagrams), and we shall find this procedure of great utility in succeeding installments, but the significance of the wave theory of light in optical imagery must always constitute the fundamental theory of the action of optical instruments. To get a proper start, therefore, we must consider the mode of propagation of light waves, and we will therefore consider a radiating, luminous point situated in space. This luminous point (light source) is in reality the center of a sphere, and is radiating light waves which advance in a periodic manner in all directions. These light waves are therefore spheres (or globes) having the light source as center, and by reference to Fig. 1 (where O is the radiating light source) we see that as the waves advance in space they become spheres of ever increasing radius (only a section of the wave train, advancing in a certain direction is shown in Fig. 1), and as the radius of curvature of these spherical waves increases, the curvature of the wave surfaces of course becomes less. After these light waves have been propagated for a considerable distance, the radii of curvature of their surfaces becomes so great, and the curvature of the wave surfaces becomes so slight, that any portion of the wave surface may be said to have an infinite radius, i. e., it is a flat surface. In this case the light is termed "parallel light," or is said to be projected as "parallel rays," which, as is well known, is practically the case with light coming from a long distance.

In Physical Optics, or the study of the Wave Theory of Light, these waves of infinite radii of curvature are known as "plane waves," or when speaking of parallel rays it is said that the light is propagated in "right lines." In the study of practical optics we do not deal with entire wave surfaces of entirely unknown dimensions in space, but only with portions of wave surfaces the size of which is governed by the superficial area of the lenses of our optical instruments. For convenience a portion of the surface of a light wave, of arbitrary dimensions governed by any proposition in hand, is known as a "wave-front," and we shall endeavor to assist the reader in visualizing a "wave-front" by reference to the diagrams, Figs. 2 and 3.

In Fig. 2 light waves are incident upon an opaque screen in which a square aperture is cut. The aperture shown is a square one, but if it had been a round one its action in allowing only a certain portion of the incident wave surface to pass through would have been comparable to the action of the front glass and mounting of a photographic objective in intercepting all but a certain portion of incident light-waves. As the light source in Fig. 2 is close to the intercepting screen the waves falling upon the screen of course have spherical surfaces, and the sections of the wave surface transmitted through the opening in the opaque screen are sections of the spherical incident light waves, or spherical wave fronts. A succession of these wave fronts is shown in Fig. 2, which is in accordance with the periodic method of propagation known as wave motion. It is convenient on the basis of the wave theory to term a succession of advancing waves, or wave-fronts, a "train" of waves or wave-fronts. Fig. 3 merely shows in perspective a train of plane wave-fronts, i. e., a succession of wave-fronts (limited portions of wave surfaces) coming from an infinite distance.

An interesting characteristic of wave propagation, which was stated to hold true for light waves as long ago as 1690 by Christiaan Huygens[1], is that any portion of a wave-front can serve as a center of disturbance from which fresh trains of waves are generated. This may be demonstrated experimentally in a very simple manner, as it used to be demonstrated by the late Silvanus P. Thompson in his lectures on Light.

A shallow metal tank (known as a ripple tank) filled with water is all the apparatus necessary. Let Fig. 4 represent a plan of the tank, which is divided into two sections, A and B, by the metal partition C. Right at the center of the partition C is a very narrow slit D which forms the means of communication between the compartments A and B. Having filled the ripple tank with water, we now touch the surface of the water with the finger, or with the end of a pencil, at the center of compartment A. This starts a series of waves, or ripples, which spread out from the center of disturbance in the form of concentric rings, as shown. When, now, the ripples, or waves have spread to such an extent that the wave-fronts come into contact with the partition C, we note that the wave-front is all intercepted except the very small portion which can pass through the slit D (in the partition C). However, when we look at the surface of the water in the compartment B of the ripple tank, we note at once that small as was the portion of the wave-front which passed through the slit D, it was able to generate a new train of complete waves, for which it acted as the center of disturbance. This experiment forms a simple proof of Huygens' early deduction, but we now leave the subject of simple wave motion and come back to the subject of the passage of light through optical systems, and the action of lenses on the wave-fronts of light incident upon them.

With the elementary information which we have thus far acquired let us proceed to ascertain what is the real action of a collecting lens upon the wave-fronts (portions of wave surfaces) which fall upon it. We return to Fig. 1, and consider the portions of the surfaces of the light waves generated by the light source in the direction of the positive (collecting) lens L. Fig. 1 shows a train of waves whose fronts, when they reach the lens L, are equal in width to the diameter of the lens, but from an extended light source an infinite number of trains of waves would be proceeding to the front surface of the lens L. The mode of propagation of all of these trains of waves would be the same, however, and any single wave train would be propagated just as is the one shown in Fig. 1, so the diagram will prove adequate for the purposes of our demonstration. We note that while traversing the air space between the source O and the lens L the spaces between successive wave-fronts are all equal, showing that the light is being propagated forward at a constant and definite velocity.

When, however, the light waves fall upon the surface of the lens, and enter the glass of which it is composed, their velocity of propagation is retarded, or slowed down, because the glass is a denser medium than air and the light waves cannot traverse it with the same rapidity with which they travel in air. Before considering further the action of the lens upon these wave-fronts of incident light we must draw attention to the shape of these incident wave-fronts. As the source O is assumed fairly near the lens, the light waves which diverge in all directions from the source possess spherical surfaces (or spherical wave-fronts, since we are only considering definite portions of the wave surfaces) and we note that in the case of these light waves diverging from the source, the spherical wave-fronts are convex wave-fronts.

Let us now return to Fig. 1 and see what is the action of a collecting lens on these incident convex wave-fronts. As we have already premised, the action of the lens is to slow down the rate of travel of the wave-fronts, when once they enter the glass, and the effect of this retardation is shown by dotted lines in Fig. 1. We firstly note that the wave-fronts are closer together within the glass, which is the diagrammatic way of representing decreased velocity of propagation of light waves.

It is further apparent in considering Fig. 1, that all portions of a wave-front incident upon a lens do not have the same thickness of glass to traverse in passing through the lens. In the case of a positive lens, Fig. 1, we see that the portion of each successive wave-front which falls upon the center of the lens has the greatest thickness of glass to traverse, and, as the thickness is so much greater at the center of the lens than at the edges, the edges of the convex (or diverging) incident wave-front get through the lens before the center of the same wave-front, with the result that the contour of an incident convex wave-front is reversed in passing through a collective lens, so that upon emergence it has the form of a concave wave-front. We saw that when the wave-fronts are convex the light is diverging, so it is now apparent that when the wave-fronts are concave the light is converging and, as a matter of simple deduction, real images are produced by concave wave-fronts which converge to a focus.

A collecting lens will, as may readily be inferred, have the same action upon a plane wave-front as upon a convex wave-front, i. e., it will transform it into a concave wave-front which will converge to a focus. Although we do not show the case diagrammatically, the action of a negative (or dispersing) lens upon incident light waves may also be readily deduced from the foregoing. In the case of a convex (diverging) wave-front incident upon a negative lens the center, or most advanced part, of the wave-front will have the least thickness of glass to traverse, with the result that it will maintain its position in advance of the edges (of the wave-front) and will emerge from the negative lens still in its original form of a convex (divergent) wave-front. This divergent or scattering action of negative lenses upon incident light causes them to be termed dispersing lenses.

We have learned from the above that the action of a lens is to imprint a new curvature on the wave-fronts of the light incident upon it, and that the character and extent of the curvature imprinted by the lens will be governed by its form and the properties (i. e. refractive index) of the material of which it is made.

All of the conventions of Geometrical Optics are in accordance with the foregoing considerations of Physical Optics, for it is conceded that light waves travel in straight lines, and by assuming that rays of light are the normals to wave-fronts, as shown in Figs. 2 and 3, we can in future represent our trains of waves by rays, which are equivalent to straight lines in diagrams. It is possible to conceive of rays of light which are not normal to the wave-fronts, and in this case the light is said to be diffracted.

Musical Review of Latest Compositions

1—"My Hawaii, You're Calling Me," by L. W. Lewis. The style of this wonderful Hawaiian Ballad is quite a contrast to the other Hawaiian compositions published up to date—"My Hawaii" is a triumph of tonal beauty, and must be considered as a very valuable addition to the library of any Musician. (Published by the Echo Music Co., New York and Seattle.)

Echo Music Company's Big Sellers

EVERY time James W. Casey, head of the Echo Music Company, goes on the road he keeps the Seattle and New York offices busy filling his orders. Last month business took such a big jump that the New York offices in the Exchange Building, 145 West Forty-fifth Street,, had to be enlarged, and still Mr. Casey has not any too much room. "My Hawaii, I Hear You Calling Me," and "My Golden West" are among the big sellers in all the five and ten cent stores throughout the country and are being featured by many of the phonograph and music roll companies. Hundreds of picture musicians who have used the numbers have written in to Mr. Casey complimenting him for the pretty melodies that he has turned out.

Mr. Casey said that what pleases him most is the fact that he has never failed to secure an order from a buyer after playing either of the songs, nor has he ever known of a leader or a pianist who was not eager to take away a copy after having heard one or the other played. So, Mr. Musician, if you really want to get hold of two good numbers that will appeal to the low or the high brows, just add to your collection "My Hawaii, I Hear You Calling Me," and "My Golden West."

Another man who does not make very much noise, but who delivers the goods in the way of good songs and instrumental numbers, is Fred Vandersloot. In Williamsport, Pa., Fred has been for a number of years, where he built up a wonderful business. His instrumental numbers are known to leaders all over the world, and his recent song successes, "I Wonder How the Old Folks Are Tonight" and "Longing for My Dixie Home," are selling just as well as many of the widely advertised hits. "I Wonder How the Old Folks Are Tonight" has already passed the million mark, and, according to some newspaper reports, is becoming a favorite with the boys in France.

But Casey and Vandersloot are not the only quiet chaps who are getting big results, for Joe Hollander, manager for the Morris Music Company, is putting over hit after hit in his unobtrusive way. Joe is one of those genial chaps who are never too busy to see any one, and when he goes after an act he usually gets a real hearing. A short time ago he launched "There's a Service Flag in Our Home," doing it in spite of the fact that some wiseacres told him it was about time to lay off on patriotic songs. Joe, however, felt that he had a novelty and went after Francis Kennedy, the vaudeville headliner, to feature it. At first, Miss Kennedy refused to put it on, not because she is not patriotic, but she feared she would die with it at the Bushwick, where all the turns on the bill ahead of her were using war songs. Joe talked with her until she finally agreed to try it out at one of the matinees, and the reception she received prompted her to say that she would not only keep the number in her act, but that she was seriously thinking of using nothing but patriotic numbers.

"Say a Prayer for the Boys Over There" is another patriotic number that Hollander has turned into a big seller. "We're Going Over" is also one of the hits of Morris's catalog, and with these three selling the way they are Morris and Hollander say that they have no cause to complain about business.

General Comments

"ARE YOU FROM HEAVEN?", Gilbert and Friedland's new ballad, is keeping Minnie Blauman busy handing out orchestrations to leaders and pianists. The other day more than thirty moving picture musicians came in for copies. Leaders who enjoyed playing "My Little Dream Girl," by the same writers, have something good in store for them, if they have not already secured orchestrations of "Are You from Heaven?"

F. J. A. Forster Music Company, Inc., has closed its New York office, but this does not mean that the concern is not doing business, for the sales of "Missouri Waltz," "Blue Rose Waltz," and "Moonlight Waltz," all by Frederick Knight Logan, are large enough to keep any company busy. The last time Forster was in New York he took back to Chicago orders for 100,000 copies of "Missouri Waltz," which is some sales, when you know that he gets eighteen cents a copy for the waltz. The Chicago office is doing more business now than it ever did.

Joseph W. Stern and Company have heard from enough singers and musicians to feel positive that they have two new hits in "When the Moon Is Shining Somewhere in France" and "Send Back Dear Daddy to Me." "Indianola," by S. R. Henry, composer of "By Heck!" and published by Stern, promises to outsell "By Heck!" When writing for copies and orchestrations of the Stern publications kindly address communications to Jos. W. Stern and Company, 102 West Thirty-eighth Street, New York City, instead of to the professional department on Broadway.

"Over There" is still getting thousands of dollars' worth of free publicity in the newspapers. From the way the song is still selling, Feist could have paid $50,000 for it and still make a big profit.

Harry Von Tilzer begins the new year with a genuine hit in "Just as Your Mother Was." And he has a big seller in "It's a Long Way to the U. S. A."

Hamilton S. Gordon, publisher, 141 West Thirty-sixth Street, the firm that gave the musical world "Silver Threads Among the Gold," is glad to say that calls from all over the country are coming in for its "Motion Picture Music Collection," which is something that every live picture musician should have close at hand.

The William Jerome Music Corporation is finding little difficulty in getting singers and musicians to feature its new patriotic hit, "When the Yanks Come Marching Home."

Theatres Worth While

Lyman C. Fisher Gets Allston

One of the finest photoplay theatres in New England is the Allston on Brighton avenue, Allston, Mass., one of the best residential sections of Boston. This splendid playhouse furnishes finest quality entertainment to a most discriminating class of patrons.

Lyman C. Fisher, who took possession of the Allston on Monday, December 24, has established an entirely new policy based on his experience and marked success with the Newton Opera House, Newton, Mass., in the past eight years, which has worked out with gratifying results. He has discarded vaudeville and the sort of pictures commonly used in mixed programs, and has adopted instead a straight pictures policy with changes Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday, instead of Monday, Thursday and Sunday.

For the Allston as well as the Newton Opera House, Mr. Fisher has booked the entire output of selective star series productions of Paramount Pictures Corporation and Artcraft Pictures Corporation.

The wisdom of Mr. Fisher's policy was proven by the more than capacity audiences that greeted Marguerite Clark in "The Amazons" the first star series Paramount production shown at the Allston on Monday and Tuesday, December 24-25. So great were the crowds that clamored for admission to the shows on Christmas Day that many were turned away disappointed.

W. C. Smith Lectures Before I. P. A., Inc.

FRIDAY evening, December 14, was the occasion of an interesting lecture at the club rooms of the I. P. A., Inc., 652 Bergen avenue, the Bronx.

The lecturer was Wm. C. Smith of the Nicholas Power Company, who explained in detail the mechanism of the Power 6B Cameragraph. For the instruction of the members Mr. Smith took the 6B Cameragraph mechanism completely apart and reassembled the same, explaining each operation clearly and in detail.

At the conclusion of his highly appreciated lecture Mr. Smith was handed a certificate of honorary membership in the I. P. A. by president Polin of the organization. Mr. Smith then made a brief speech of acknowledgment.

As further evidence of the association's intention to be of benefit to its members, it is announced that classes for operators in Physics and Applied Electricity will be conducted under the auspices of the Association by Frank S. Pircher, E.E., B.Sc., assisted by Edward McD. Benheim, who will give instruction in Mathematics.

Information concerning this new medium of instruction for operators, and also with regard to membership in the I. P. A., Inc., may be secured by addressing the corresponding secretary, Morris J. Rotker, at the Association's address, given above.

Directory of New Theatres

CALIFORNIA

The new Liberty Star theatre now in course of construction at Bay Point is fast being pushed to completion. It will have a seating capacity of 400.

J. H. Hatch, owner of the Burlingame theatre and other valuable business property in Burlingame, is having plans drawn for a new moving picture show house. The present building is to be offered to the Government for a post-office and the new building, in the event the Government accepts the offer, will be erected alongside of the present theatre. Mr. Hatch has given Martel Brothers, occupants of the wood building adjacent to the theatre, notice to vacate within two months. It is planned to move the wood building away to make room for the new theatre, which will be much larger and better than the present theatre building.

Manager Schuhmann, of the new Florence theatre now in course of erection on East Colorado street, Pasadena, is authority for the statement that his playhouse will be ready for occupancy in the very near future, the work of construction moving along satisfactorily.

IDAHO

Herman J. Brown, proprietor of the New Majestic now in course of construction at Nampa, says the new theatre will embody the last word in beauty and comfort, and predicts that it will eventually be one of the most attractive public buildings in the West.

ILLINOIS

The remodeled Empress theatre, Springfield, was opened last week to capacity business.

INDIANA

MONTANA

Work has been started on the erection of a modern fireproof theatre building at Harlowtown by a local firm of business men, Myera and Ervin. The theatre will be housed in a three-story reinforced concrete structure, to be erected at a cost of about $62,000, the present estimate. Link & Hare, a firm of Helena architects, will oversee the work. Both standard and the silent drama will hold forth in the new theatre, which will be known as the American. Its stage will accommodate the largest company on the road, Mr. Myers said in an interview, adding: "We will take care of anything in the show line the people here want."

NEW YORK

Max Weiss, manager of the Fulton theatre, Hempstead, has announced that in the very near future, the theatre will be completely rebuilt and enlarged. Negotiations are under way for the purchase of additional land in the rear of the theatre. New balconies will be put in, and arrangements for seating of over 1,000 people.

Preliminary plans for a theatre proposed by Warren N. Cross, a theatrical man, for the corner of East avenue and Elm street, Lockport, were received to-day by Mr. Cross from Lewis & Hill, architects. The front elevation is of polished creamed brick and tile, with two stories on either side of a deep lobby entrance to the theatre proper. The stories will be 22 by 30, and the lobby of the same dimensions. The theatre will occupy the ground in the rear of the stores and lobby, and the entire structure will be 160 by 66 feet. The estimated cost is $100,000.

OHIO

The Elyria theatre, at Sandusky, which on Labor Day last was completely destroyed by fire, has been rebuilt and remodeled, and was formally opened a week ago to capacity business.

RHODE ISLAND

The Majestic, a new theatre in Providence, was opened January 1. It seats 3,000 persons, and will be booked by the Shuberts.

WASHINGTON

The Grand theatre, at Sunnyside, was opened a week ago with Jack Gardner in "Men of the Desert." Betts & Son, in remodeling the Sherman Building, have converted it into a pretty little theatre.

Building A Name
There is just one thing that money can't buy for your theatre—and that is a Good Name. You must build that up. Constant attention to your patrons, in the pictures you run, in the comforts of your theatre, in everything you do, is the only way you can get it. And if you fail in the slightest detail, you might just as well fail in all. If your weekly program is poor in appearance and appeal, all the effort you have spent on securing good pictures, and looking out for the comfort and satisfaction of your patrons is wasted.

A STORY like "Wolves of the Rail"—a whoop, a mad gallop, a shot in the silent night—it gets them all—sets them all talking—brings new ones—

brings them back.

All barriers go down before the tremendous popular appeal of William S. Hart.

Some people like juveniles, some like ingenues; you have to run the best of all of them to get all the people—but

That's why William S. Hart is more than a star—he's a positive necessity.

His Broadway Success

"The Guilty Man"

By Ruth Helen Davis and Charles Klein. Irvin V. Willat, director.

Supervision of Thomas H. Ince, Inc.

This Is the Play That Made New York Gasp

"THE GUILTY MAN" is a merciless attack upon the double standard of morality—a play of lofty impulse, of noble purpose.

New York gasped when it saw the A. H. Woods production of "The Guilty Man" at the Astor Theatre. "It is the last word in emotional drama," critics wrote.

This Astor Theatre success is now ready for your theatre, in an A. H. Woods motion picture, supervised by Thos. H. Ince, Inc., even more vivid than the sensational stage version.

Released by Paramount Pictures Corporation

"The Spirit of '17"

A PICTURE to Make Them Talk—A real, live Yankee Doodle story.

The new story of Patriotism, in the old home town, is on a par with the now famous Jack Pickford photoplay success "Seventeen."

Jack Pickford's great success, "Seventeen," has been seized upon as material for a play.

It will have its New York premier at the Broadhurst Theatre the week of January 21.

The superb photoplay production was made possible by the greatest organization of the industry and the dramatic possibilities of the story were brought to the attention of the spoken stage by the photoplay's overwhelming success.

It'll pay you to line up with an organization that "puts over" such triumphs.

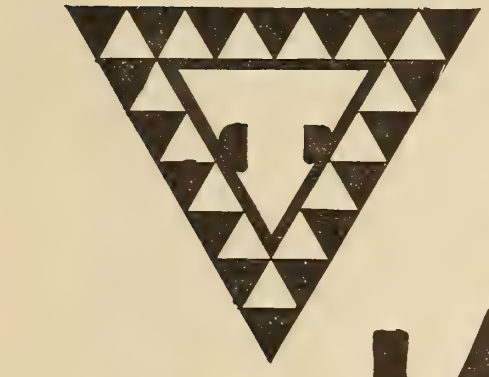
TRIANGLE is operated on U. S. Railroad Principles

When press despatches burned the wires with the announcement that President Wilson had taken over the railroads, an electric thrill passed through the great body of the nation. For a second people were dazed. And then the great fact dawned on them; that the nation has passed through a gigantic economic movement for traffic stabilization, that the public welfare would come first and private profits were no longer a first consideration. From the four corners of the greatest nation of the world arose a shout of praise.

While the Railroads of the United States represent an investment of billions and Triangle investment is but a fraction of this great sum; and while the railroads are a great governmental institution and Triangle but a private enterprise;—yet principles of a common nature govern both and make Triangle worthy of more than passing attention.



Triangle in stabilizing the production and distribution of its pictures and issuing them in a program of the highest merit and utmost box-office power, has solved the problem of exhibitors who wish to be constantly certain of consistent service and ever-growing patronage.

Triangle has first and foremost the welfare of the exhibitor at heart. The success of Triangle exhibitors means the continued success of the Triangle investment of millions at the Culver City studios, and of the Great Triangle distributing organization.

Triangle strikes at the heart of commercial weakness—waste. Like the government it will have no empty freights lying on side switches because of inefficiency. Every dollar of investment brings its proper return. Directors are artists who plan before they produce. Waste is as hateful in Triangle as a snake to a plainsman. The standing order is, " Kill Waste."

There is a to-morrow, Mr. Exhibitor, which is as important as to-day. To-day should bear its profits, but to-morrow will see the public convinced that you and not your competitor are to be the continued success. Triangle exhibitors face to-morrow confidently, knowing that they are more than making good with the public to-day.

Get aboard the Triangle train. Triangle steam is up. There's a Triangle track ahead of you that leads straight to success. Any Triangle exchange manager or salesman will insure your passage to Triangle service. RUN TRIANGLE.

Get The Conservation Idea

IN a smart little mid-Western town a motion picture exhibitor was one of the town boosters.

Figuring as one of its most progressive citizens, he was to the fore in every civic movement. Someone broached the idea of establishing a central market—a place where the householders could go to buy poultry and potatoes to advantage and where the farmer and gardener could sell profitably to the consumer with a mutual conservation of distributing costs. The motion picture man was quick to see the benefits of this plan and boomed it enthusiastically. And because he was influential his advocacy did much to put the central market plan across.

At the same time this motion picture exhibitor, while buying his turnips at a central market, never thought of buying his film at one.

General Film Company is the exhibitor's central market, if he but realizes it.

For General Film Company co-ordinates service, eliminates distribution waste, and conserves overhead costs—to the great advantage of the consumer. It is to the entire picture field what a great store is to a community, as for instance an Emporium to San Francisco, a Marshall Field & Co. to Chicago, a John Wanamaker's to New York.

Not a day passes but the conservation idea in this country is advanced to a sensational degree. Every big industry has its example. The national government is applying it rapidly, in history-making fashion, to all the chief commodities—to meat, wheat, coal, oil—striking out the distribution waste and the service waste with a determined hand. Nowhere is the principal more vitally applied than in the government management of transportation—millions of dollars being saved by cutting out the unnecessary duplication of traffic.

General Film Company is equipped and organized to do this thing for motion picture product, and in fact is doing it. Motion pictures in this day comprise a real commodity. Everybody is practising conservation—the government, the railroads, every big industry, the community market, the cross roads general store. Even the motion picture showman applies it to his household affairs.

But when he turns to General Film Company for his pictures he at once hooks up with conservation in his business, where he needs it most of all.

And General Film Company will save him more and more as the bulk of product passing through its organization increases.

Very truly,

GENERAL FILM COMPANY (Inc.)

A magazine's success is measured by its advertising. Look at the "News!"

Break the shackles-

Mr. First Run Exhibitor:

If you have brains enough to own a theatre worth half a million dollars you should use those brains to run your own business.

You are not running your own business when you sign a contract that forces junk pictures on your screen under the camouflage of a big name.

You are not running your own business when you are shackled by a contract to the slavery of oversold pictures, exorbitant rentals, no profits and displeased patrons.

You are not running your own business in the interest of your audiences and your own box office if you do not keep your doors open for the best picture each week, regardless of who produced it.

Yes, we mean absolute, free and unqualified open booking for your big, fine theatre, because anything else is handing your business independence and your profits over to the concern with the overpaid star for pictures that are ninety per cent. star and ten per cent. production.

These conditions make it essential that some responsible firm in the motion picture business should undertake to wake up the entire industry to the rotten conditions of the present system, and Metro welcomes this opportunity to again step out in front in behalf of the exhibitors.

Metro's proved friendship for the exhibitor is based on Metro's knowledge of the motion picture theatres and their problems. Metro's managers are exhibitors as well as manufacturers and distributors.

In pointing the way out for the exhibitor, we first congratulate the big first run exhibitors who have already thrown their ruinous and impossible contracts overboard. A contract that is not equitable to both sides is always bad business.

Break the shackles-

Note—This is the first of several plain fact statements

run your own business!

THE REMEDY:---

Metro's honest advice to every exhibitor using weekly runs is—Sign no contracts with any one distributor. Book pictures solely on their entertainment value so that your patrons will be continually satisfied. Don't accept junk pictures merely because a big star appears in them. By so doing you swindle your audience and cheat yourself.

The success of your house depends on your booking the best picture each week.

Metro could point to its really great specials, "Blue Jeans" with Viola Dana, "Revelation" with Nazimova, "The Legion of Death" with Edith Storey, as well as "The Slacker" and "Draft 258", or to its All Star Series productions that are as big and fine as most specials, but that is not Metro's purpose in this frank statement to exhibitors. You can find in the market now, and will in the future, plenty of big box office attractions without making exclusive contracts with any one distributor. You can secure them at prices you can afford to pay.

We provide our productions at prices you can afford to pay and we want you to judge for yourself, to pick and choose, and if Metro pictures don't ring the bell, Metro isn't entitled to your patronage.

Mr. First Run Man read this advertisement over again, from top to bottom, and then run your own business!!!

HAS THE QUALITY CIRCULATION OF THE TRADE

"The Exhibitors' Medium of Communication"

Volume 17. No. 4 January 26, 1918

Straight Ahead!

"THE United States is not going to quit—why should you?"

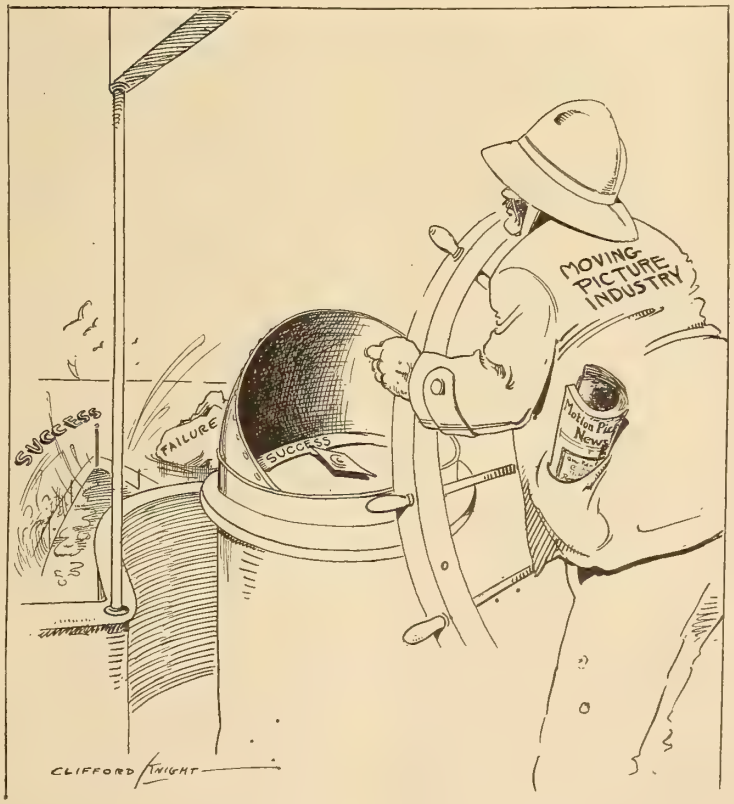
We would like to take credit for the above. It appeared, with a lot of other ringing sentences and a whole bushel of sound, live American sense, in a full page announcement in the New York Times from the Photoplay Magazine.

Its message is of more value to the American business man than the combined reasoning of all the editorials appearing that day in all the New York dailies. It's good sense because it's true sense.



The announcement urges the American business man to build up his good will during the war period.

And it hits straight home to you—Mr. Exhibitor, whoever and wherever you are, whether you are making or losing money—however you are situated.

Listen to this, or rather paste it in your hat—

"If your business is built on publicity—on the public's knowledge of you and its good will toward you—are you going to keep that knowledge alive and that good will active—or not?"

Your business, Mr. Exhibitor, is built upon publicity—as much so as any business and more particularly so than most any other business.

Your good will—have you ever thought about it?

Your good will is a big part—it may be practically all of your capital investment. It is a real thing. It is actually worth from five to ten times your yearly profits.

Good will is like a plant. You may keep it up and make it more valuable or you can let it rot. It will decay just as surely as wood will rot and metal will rust and wear away.

You Can't—Can't—Let It Die!

THE big thing for you to consider now—and it's a mighty important consideration—is: what will your good will be after the war? Are you going to save it or not?

Take out your pencil now—and figure what your good will is worth. You'll probably find that it's worth saving even if you don't make much money during the war period. But don't figure that way—except to get a clear illustration of value. Figure to make money during the war period. You can—and you will, if you will do it.

"The war period," says the announcement, "is the acid test."

So say we; and we've said it before. You'll be one of the money-making exhibitors during and after the war, or you'll not; you'll have a fine good will investment after the war or you'll have nothing—dependent whether you decide now to go straight ahead with full steam and courage or crawl into your shell and wait for a buyer or the sheriff to come along.

"The United States is not going to quit—why should you?"

Down to Bed Rock

IF you think that we're writing this as optimistic fol-de-rol, you're mistaken. We were never more serious. We want to tell you what we know to be true and what we feel to be true; and furthermore and more to the point, we are practicing what we preach.

When the war tax was slapped on, the industry got

Notice to Subscribers

IF YOUR COPY of MOTION PICTURE NEWS does not arrive at its usual time do not assume that it has been lost in transit. Voices in the Wilderness

A WORD of thanks is due the Hearst publications in all cities and to Arthur Brisbane's Washington Times for the outspoken manner in which they are taking up the cudgels for the motion picture.

Both in combating ideas of false economy and senseless curbing for fuel purposes, these publications have been quick to speak and, surely, of considerable value.

A rising vote of thanks is called for—and given.

its first clear revelation—through the closed eyes of the pocket-book—of just what the war really meant.

Then followed a period of pessimism—naturally. The fog is still on.

England had the very same experience. Right after England got its full realization of war the industry was seized with nervous hysteria. Theatres were to be closed by Government edict; taxes were ruinous anyway—there was no hope.

The fog is gone now—three years gone; and what do we find?

The majority of picture theatres in Great Britain are making more money than ever before—despite the fact that the admission tax is 33 1-3 per cent as against 10 per cent here. The theatres that have closed have been compelled to largely for one reason—the drafting of organized labor from one locality to another for munition making—and the consequent depopulation in part of centain centres.

More American prints are being shipped today to Great Britain than ever before. That tells the story.

Talk of "Now!"—Not "Tomorrow"

WE have prophesied a big revival of picture business for 1918. This period, to our best knowledge and belief, is beginning right now. We have many such reports from the field. Business is good—everywhere, excepting only the smaller houses that are reducing their show nights.

The heads of every exchange system in New York report to us greatly increased receipts last week. In one instance the reported increase in business is $5,500.

Industries will hum this year. This is no idle saying. It's an obvious fact. The Government alone, it is stated on authority, will spend more on construction this year than has been spent by the whole country in any previous year.

This is motion picture money.

We fail to see why picture theatres should fare worse than British theatres during the war period. We do not see why they should fare better.

There has been a whisper that the Government will class motion pictures as a non-essential. We don't believe there is the slightest chance of such a pronouncement.

War is business; and business demands money. No legitimate business is a non-essential which can make money for the Government's great war burden. Money is in itself a munition of war.

The Government says "Conserve," not "Quit!"

Conserve your heat and light — for the Government. You'll have to adapt your business to such necessary restrictions as are imposed. Conserve your waste—for your own sake.

Cut out the useless waste. It's a painstaking job, but go to it. Cut off every dollar of useless expense. And don't forget that one of the greatest wastes of all is your wasted energy and application. Put a few more hours into your business day. Be more of a showman.

Trim your ship; but don't strip it. If you see a good way to spend money—a way that will develop and strengthen your business for the future, that will add solidly to your good-will investment, go to it! Spend it and don't be afraid.

* * * *

Putting the Preacher to the Test

THAT is just exactly what this publication is doing. We don't say it for self-advertisement; we want you to know that we practice what we preach.

Our paper is the goods we make and sell. We are putting more money into these goods and into their wider distribution than ever before. And we'll continue to do this, even if we have to dig into our capital and even if the war lasts five years.

We're investing in good will—about the finest, surest investment we know of.

Don't be afraid. You've nothing to fear outside the industry—now or in the future, unless of course you think the United States are going to quit. And you've nothing to fear inside the industry.

Hold Tight! Keep Plugging! Don't Quit!

PAY no attention to the rumors from Times Square. They never materialize. They exist only for yellow journals and curb gossip. They have no place in your business curriculum. Don't take a pessimistic utterance any way but intelligently. There's generally a reason for the other fellow's business troubles; it's his own, not the industry's, fault.

Perhaps you are up against exorbitant rentals, forced to bid against your competitor until you simply cannot make money. Then we have this to say, that the same industry capable of fostering such abuses is capable of curing them. As certain as day follows night some man or plan will rise to the occasion and meet you on a legitimate basis. Your business always rises to meet good business. Don't quit now; the future looks too good.

Stick! Don't give up your ship. After you've borne the brunt of it don't sell out and see the other fellow reap your harvest.

Go straight ahead. W. A. JOHNSTON.

Serving It with Speed and Ginger

A NEWSPAPER man has lost considerable of the joy of life by the time he has obtained the real trade paper viewpoint.

For he has learned that every time he says, "It is rumored," he causes some damage—and "dollars and cents" damage, too, which is more to the point. Imagine, for example, that he writes, "It is rumored that the Solar and Lunar programs are about to merge." For weeks afterwards the Solar and Lunar exchange managers and salesmen all over the country are going to hear nothing but:

"Naw! I don't wanna sign a contract, yet. I read somewhere where Lunar people are gonna buy you fellows out and I wanna know where I get off 'fore I sign with you people." Or——

"Say, cancel my contract, willya? I hear that Solar's gonna take you over and those people got a coupla stars on their program what couldn't draw a draught in my house. Lemme out from under." Or——

"Nix! You can't talk business with me. Wait till things settle down. Everything's too upset now. Come around in a coupla months."

And by the time the combined cusses of the Solar and Lunar salesmen ascend skyward our friend the newspaper man knows that, to say the least, the recording angel is going to record "a strong rumor" to the effect that he was not a very popular boy here below.

* * * *

ALL of which is a rather dry introduction to the statement that——

This week, last week, the week before and for many weeks past we could have given you some spicy merger rumors.

But we haven't—for two reasons.

First, because to date there has been considerable talk and no action. And talk never took a nickel out or put one into a box office.

And, second, because when action does come it won't make a particle of difference to you, as an exhibitor, in your dealings with the producers now supplying your program. A few—or several—of the producers will get together in one exchange system and save considerable distribution overhead. But your contracts and your dealings will go on with the individual companies just as they have been.

In six months—or a year—a saving will have resulted to the producers that will be reflected strongly in general film conditions and possibly in film rentals.

But, meanwhile, Mr. Exhibitor, keep plugging along on "hold fast" lines—and don't let a rumor get within six miles of your box-office.

* * * *

OF course, if we had a Broadway Limited circulation we would give you these rumors—just as they have been given the grace of print.

But Broadway, strange as it may seem, is not quite all of this picture industry. No, not quite all.

* * * *

WE have tried, in this issue of the NEWS, to give you the latest developments in the fuel situation in the Eastern States. But those popular gentry, the fuel administrators, right-about-face with such rapidity and frequency that overnight happenings will probably change conditions entirely.

And, since the news pages tell you the story, we must confine ourselves on this page to a prophecy. And the prophet saith:

There won't be any three-day closing of theatres or any one-day closing.

And, after some moons, unless the gods of the weather have come to their rescue, there may be some seven-day closings of fuel administrators. Selah!

* * * *

HOW do you like those "magaziney" features from the field we have been giving you for several weeks now?

We think they're great ourselves—but then we are so modest. So you had better turn the page now and read "It Can't Be Done." It's the story of Richards and Flynn—we almost said Damon and Pythias—of Kansas City.

Two boys who showed that "It Can Be Done"—when you know how and have the nerve.

* * * *

THERE are two stories in this issue that give the pessimists four knuckles square between the eyes.

Both come from the Coast. One concerns Universal and tells of the number of companies being added to the producing forces there.

The other is the tale of the tremendous studio expansion planned for the Fox plant.

Neither can be termed "fol-de-rol optimism," for both concern the spending of real money—and between the pessimists and the optimists commend us to the boys who are spending real coin of the realm.

* * * *

WHILE speaking of optimism, take a glance at "The Independent Field Ticker," that meaty stock quotation method of telling you what's selling and who's buying in the state rights field.

When we started this department some few months ago it used to take three or four inches. Circuit talk in abundance had put a sort of damper on the field.

Now, with the circuit propositions stronger than ever, with a new combination promised along the lines suggested by W. L. Sherrill at the Washington exhibitor conference, and with war pessimism trying to show its head—well, this week The Ticker ran over to two pages.

* * * *

MUTUAL announces this week a twice-a-week two-reel news pictorial. All news, too—not a reel of news and a reel of magazine.

March 4 is set for the date of the first issue. It's an interesting announcement, both for what it says and what it leaves unsaid.

The new pictorial will be handled by the Mutual organization from Chicago. Which prepares us, with attentive ears, to hear something from Gaumont.

* * * *

WALTER W. IRWIN breaks into print twice in this week's issue. In the first place, you learn "What Kind of Fellow is—Irwin?" from a true-to-life interview by Wm. A. Johnston.

Then you learn more concerning "What Kind of a Fellow is—Irwin," by reading a corking good answer made by the Vitagraph head to Frank A. Vanderlip. Plus his ability as a film man, Mr. Irwin marshals a sound knowledge of economics and a lawyer's power of driving home his point—with the result, a story worth reading.

The New Twelfth Street Was Away Ahead of Expectations

You Can't Do It

Being an account of how Richards and Flynn did do it

Or the miracle of a lemon that was transformed into a golden orange

[Editor's Note—There were really half a dozen stories in this little Kansas City classic. We could have called it "What Happened When I Raised My Prices" for Richards and Flynn have been pioneers in price raising at every boost for the past ten years. We could have titled it "Making the Lemons Pay" for Richards and Flynn, have shown an extraordinary ability to take the bad ones and make them winners. But we have called it "It Can't Be Done," telling a story that every successful exhibitor knows, it gives an inspiration that every soon-to-be-successful exhibitor needs—tells of men who faced the anvil chorus, the knockers, the gloom dispellers, the well-meaning but short-sighted friends who take the very heart out of you with their "It Can't Be Done." Buck up, if you're one of the pluggers with big dreams and whole-hearted ambitions who is being told "It Can't Be Done" and take heed from Richards and Flynn who showed that "It Can Be Done."]

IT was a gloomy evening in Kansas City, Mo.

In front of a theatre that was closed and dark stood two young men and several of their friends. Cobwebs draped the faded posters. Dust and the litter blown in from the street contributed to a rather mucky setting.

But the friends were the chief cause of the gloom. Brooms, mops and elbow grease would remove the dust and litter; only decisive, rapid-fire action could ever make an impression upon the gloomy friends.

"You can't do it," said the first of these, in a voice weighted with sadness. "You can't do it; that's all."

The two young men gulped and said nothing.

"No sirree!" chirped up another. "I know. I'm a wise guy in the picture business. It can't be done."

"You'll never get away with it, boys," opened up a third in confidential and despondent accents. "This place is a jonah." He stared at the two young men as though he were attending their funeral. He was a reasonably successful exhibitor himself.

Richards and Flynn, who were the two young men, exchanged glances, shifted their feet, puffed thoughtfully at their respective cigars, and—continued to say nothing.

There was nothing much to say. Their good friends, on hearing that they had decided to buy the Wonderland theatre, had come all this way to tell them how foolish their judgment was. It was very thoughtful of them. Richards and Flynn told them so, and thanked them.

When the party broke up the two young men proceeded soberly up the street in silence.

As they were turning the corner Richards suddenly looked at his companion, and burst out:

"Say, people said the same thing to Harriman when he started to build the big cut-off across Great Salt Lake."

And Flynn replied:

"Didn't everybody knock McAdoo when he began boring the holes to bring trains under the river into New York?"

All the next day, as the news spread around, friends of Richard and Flynn dropped in to see them, called them up on the 'phone, and informed them confidentially that they had been handed a lemon. The lemon's name was the Wonderland, but it was a lemon just the same.

Somebody Was Sure to Sidle Up With a Wet Blanket in Each Hand

Let us see why Richards' and Flynn's friends were so downhearted.

The partners' dream, to begin with, was all wrong from the business viewpoint, a viewpoint based on long experience of others. Experience had proved that a theatre located downtown in Kansas City was not a paying investment. But the Wonderland had more than that against it. From the outside it looked like a regular dime museum. Its lobby was cluttered up with penny-in-the-slot machines; and 'way in back of these glittering decorations was a "motion picture show." You know what it was like; undertaker chairs, and a rippled sheet tacked up on the wall. Mary Pickford was walking to work then—if there was work.

The partners gave that row of slot machines a look that should have set them in flames, and exterminated them like so many vermin.

They boarded up the front, got busy with painters, carpenters, interior decorators and electricians.

Then they fed the anvil chorus a great big jolt—they fixed the tariff for the new house at ten cents. Think of it—some ten years ago—and an admission price of ten cents for a salvaged wreck. But listen to Brother Richards tell how it went over:

"It just seemed to have been what they had been waiting for. They paid their dimes and came right in. And—" he paused here and smiled. It went without saying that "they" have been coming right in ever since.

The Wonderland grew out of the ruins as San Francisco has grown out of the earthquake.

Folks who had formerly scorned the place began dropping in during lunch hours. It was talked about. But the pessimistic friends of the youthful partners stuck to their guns.

In a year or so the little theatre that had been established "on the outskirts" was abandoned. Not because it was no longer on a paying basis, but because of an expired lease; and Richards & Flynn cast about for new fields to conquer. The field proved close at hand.

Just a short block east on Twelfth street from the now prosperous Wonderland was a new and much larger house playing, at five cents, Universal short features and comedies. Theoretically, the house should have been a howling success; practically it barely approached the paying basis. In other words the big Twelfth Street, as it was called, appeared decidedly lonesome as to interior during the greater part of each business day. Things looked rather hopeless to the proprietor and he was glad enough to relinquish it to the hands of Richards & Flynn—and again the word went round that Richards & Flynn had acquired a "loser."

Two other houses in the next block were playing at five cents and "getting away big"—to all appearances the Twelfth Street, by virtue of its bigness and superior appointments, should have been topping the rest in receipts.

Crowds coming out are hit in the eye by the seductive electrics of the other theatre

Their good friends made it a point to tell them how bad their judgment was. It was very thoughtful of them.

But the smaller houses were doing the "topping," and a careful survey of theatre conditions brought to Richards and Flynn what immediately proved the solution—super-features at advanced admission prices. It meant the literal transformation of a house that had built a certain "nickel patronage" into a theatre catering to a select class of theatre-goers. Furthermore the select class of patrons in point had to be educated, at least in part, into the belief that fine entertainment could be found in a portion of the downtown district anything but exclusive.

It was a situation more drastic than is ordinarily faced by exhibitors even of the broad experience of Messrs. Richards and Flynn.

Immediately the theatre was closed. A force of decorators went to work and the Richards and Flynn transformation process took place. They met and overcame the problem of subdued lighting. The lighting in that theatre is perfect—soft, limpid, ample—yet the image on the screen is not disturbed. And the finest of print can be read easily in any part of the place.

Richards and Flynn made their wisest move. They put in the best pictures to be had on the market. By a persuasive and seductive advertising campaign they began educating the public up to better pictures at higher prices. But they made the point that the pictures, not the price, were the things to talk about.

A carefully selected orchestra and a pipe organ having the mellowest and the richest and most sonorous of tones, were installed.

The re-decoration was pronounced wonderful.

Richards and Flynn were a little awed by it themselves. They stood and looked at their handiwork; they listened to the splendid music of that great orchestra, and to the voluptuous voice of the magnificent organ.

But modesty was not given a chance to be forgotten. Whenever they began to feel like thumping each other on the back, someone was sure to sidle up with a wet blanket in either hand.

Their old exhibitor friend from the other side of town, who had clung all these years to his beliefs in the nickelodeon with undertaker chairs to sit on and a rippled sheet tacked on the wall, to look at, came up and shook his head sorrowfuly and commiseratingly. Let it be said that the years had not treated him any too well, in spite of the belief he had in his own convictions. His derby looked a wee bit fuzzy; the velvet lapels on his overcoat were beginning to show signs of shoddiness and shininess. Nor did his red necktie look any too fresh and unwrinkled.

"You can't get away with it," he said, and was interrupted by a triumphant peal of the organ.

"With what?" asked Richards and Flynn in one voice.

"With all this—this false glitter and show," replied the exhibitor compassionately. "Mark my word, boys, you'll be bankrupt inside of six months. You're not giving grand opera. You're showing motion pictures! Don't you know there's a big difference?"

Richards and Flynn came out of the clouds and registered meekness.

"Yessirree! You'll be busted—flat on your backs—in six months!"

"The poor-house never had any terrors for me," said Richards.

"Me either!" supplied the other half of the partnership.

Nevertheless both of them confessed afterwards that when the house was crammed to the doors on opening night, they knew positively that the bulk of their patrons had paid their fifteen cents merely to satisfy curiosity.

With the opening of this glorified picture theatre came new and perplexing problems. The public wasn't at all willing at first to pay fifteen cents for what they thought had formerly been given to them for ten cents, and, before that, for a nickel.

It was up to the capable advertising department of Richards and Flynn to show the public that such an opinion was wrong. After a long campaign of advertising the public agreed that Richards and Flynn were telling the truth, the whole truth.

Of course, other exhibitors followed the example set by this headstrong pair. Prices went up. Programs were improved. Exhibiting became more of a business and not so much of a gamble. Altogether the community was helped by it.

Since then the newer and bigger Wonderland has also planted its both feet solidly on Twelfth street. And a nice complication has grown out of the nearness of the Wonderland and the Twelfth Street. It has become a matter of showmanship strategy each week to select programs which will not conflict, which, being in direct competition, will augment, not cut down, the patronage of the other.

The programs of the Wonderland are changed two or three times weekly, while those at the Twelfth Street run seven days, or longer, in the cases of exceptional hits.

Moreover, the patrons leaving the Twelfth Street are attracted by the blazing sign of the Wonderland, and vice versa.

"Can it be done?" said Richards to Flynn.

"We can try," said Flynn to Richards.

Managers Fight Three-Day Closing

William Travers Jerome Engaged to Present Argument Before Fuel Administration—Eastern Seaboard Affected—Figures Compiled Showing More Harm Than Good Will Come from Closing

THEATRICAL interests, including practically all motion picture theatres in the city of New York, have banded to face the proposed closing ordinance caused by fuel shortage. The primary result was a meeting January 13 at the offices of Marcus Loew, following a suggestion from the Fuel Administration that all amusements be closed three days a week. At this conference, attended by representatives of 118 theatres, plans were laid to put the case before the National Administration. It is hoped, the managers and exhibitors say, evidence can be shown to convince the Administration that closing orders will do more harm than good to the Government.

Nicholas M. Schenck represented motion pictures and vaudeville, and William A. Brady was present for the Broadway managers.

Government Will Lose

Marcus Loew, owner of the Loew circuit of theatres, and one of the biggest motion picture theatre owners in New York, announces that William Travers Jerome, attorney of New York, has been engaged by the representatives of 118 legitimate, vaudeville and motion pictures in New York to present the theatrical men's arguments before the National Fuel Administration against the closing of the theatres.

Figures showing the amount of coal which the theatres actually consumed, were made known at this meeting by competent engineers. Assuming that the theatres were closed three nights a week, as has been suggested by the authorities, the figures show that less than 169 tons of could would be saved in the 118 theatres a day. The value of this coal is estimated to be $2.700. To offset this saving and to show where the Government would actually lose by the move, it was shown by actual figures that during these three nights the Government would lose in revenue from the tax on admissions more than $11,000, and that more than 3,000 actors and 1,000 theatre workers would be thrown out of work.

Tumulty Intercedes

The first, and what is considered the most effective point registered in favor of the theatrical interests in their argument against the closing the theatres is the action taken by Joseph P. Tumulty, secretary to President Wilson, when he telegraphed Fuel Administrator Garfield asking him not to take action which will close the theatres until the managers get a hearing in the matter.

The argument employed by the theatrical interests is that no fuel would be saved by such action on the part of the Fuel Administration. It is contended that even though such action were taken, it would be necessary for all theatres to keep steam up to prevent the pipes from freezing, and unless this could be done the theatres would have to close entirely. If closed altogether, theatrical interests say, a million men would be thrown out of work, the Government would lose millions in revenue, the public would be denied necessary relaxation from their work and thousands in New York, who are now without fuel with which to heat their homes and who seek refuge in the theatres, particularly the motion picture theatres, would be left without any means of evading the cold.

Theatres Arrayed Against Action

The only theatres not represented at the meeting are the small motion picture houses, it was announced. The theatrical interests, with these few exceptions, are arrayed against the closing of theatres for three days a week. The figures which have been compiled by experts, conclusively show that the Government will be the loser in the end, and that the welfare of neither the Government nor the public is benefited. The engineers who have compiled these figures and who have paid particular attention to the economical phase, contend that more coal will be burned if this action is taken by the authorities. They state that the amount of fuel consumed in providing warmth for crowds of people in amusement places is only a fraction of the amount that these people would burn if they were to remain in their homes during the time that they would otherwise spend in the theatres and other places of amusement. When the people go to the theatre, it is contended, they bank their fires and only a minimum amount of fuel is consumed during the time they are absent from their homes. This argument not alone applies to the amount of fuel which is used for heating purposes but to the amount which is consumed in lighting the homes. There is absolutely no fuel consumed for light while the members of the family are away and this means an immense saving in the fuel that is burned to supply light, it is contended.

All States Should Sacrifice

Albert H. Wiggin, state fuel administrator, said at the meeting held Sunday at the Grand Central Terminal, which was the most important meeting held, that he did not think that New York should be called upon to make any sacrifices that were not made by the other states. He said that the city and state would submit to any order, no matter how drastic, if coming from Washington, provided the other states involved were placed under the same order. In view of this it was announced at the meeting that all future orders to effect the closing of theatres and other nonessential industries and places of amusement would have to come from Washingon. Such orders, if they are issued from Washington, will be in the nature of blanket orders and affect New England, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland and Delaware or practically the entire Eastern seaboard, north of Virginia. It is estimated that eleven states will be included, and that the daily loss in earnings will be, approximately, $20,000,000, and that there will be thrown out of work more than 9,000,000 persons.

All Amusements Included

All amusements, under which head comes the motion picture theatres, will, if the intentions of the fuel administrations, both State and National, are carried out, be closed for a certain number of days each week, and may, eventually, if the fuel problem is not solved, be closed altogether until the coal bunkers of New York City are filled.

Last Friday, in Boston, definite action was taken by the local authorities, with the result that an order was issued which calls for the closing of all motion picture houses at ten o'clock, as the first step taken with amusements as an objective, to conserve the fuel supply. Following this action of the Boston authorities, a conference was held Saturday night at the Union League Club, New York, at which representatives of the National Fuel Administration and representatives of the local administration were present, and although nothing definite concerning the actual steps to be taken to conserve the fuel supply was decided, action was taken on the suggestion offered by a representative of the

The Reader Has His Say

War Tax Keeps the Children Away

Editor Motion Picture News:

Dear Sir: I am a very recent subscriber to your excellent magazine but already it has been worth much more than the subscription price. Your holiday number was especially good; full of clever suggestions which I shall certainly keep in mind.

I am very much interested in the Mastbaum controversy and was especially interested in the letter of Mr. J. C. Flack (Motion Picture News, December 22).

Personally I am not in a position to make any statement regarding the war tax from my experience as an exhibitor, for I have had the actual experience of my father's theatre but a short time. I do know, however, that since the raise in admission prices the attendance has fallen off considerably, especially that of the children.

Very truly yours,
ALMA P. WOLKE.
Joy Theatre,
Grant's Pass, Oregon.

A Word to the Wise Passed Along by Exhibitor Mims

Editor Motion Picture News:

Dear Sir: Several merchants of this city have been "held up" by a slick artist posing as a program agent and we want you to publish a notice in your trade paper and see if we cannot catch up with this thief and keep others from being "stung" by him.

First I was called on by this supposed agent and was offered programs for my theatre for twenty weeks gratis if I would distribute them to my patrons. Of course I accepted this proposition. Then he goes out and gets the merchants to advertise on the program and collects six dollars from each in advance. He claims that the four regular advertisers, namely, Coca-Cola, Gossard's Corsets, Beich's Candy, and one other national advertiser. His name, as he gives it, is A. B. Naff and the receipt (the only trace he leaves) bears the name Midland Program Company, with no address.

Surely if you will devote a small write-up to this the exhibitors over the country will read it and the thief can be caught. It is mighty bad for such frauds to live off the moving picture business.

Thanking you for this, we are,
IRVING B. MIMS.

"Bargain Shows" and a Man Who Admits Children Free

Editor Motion Picture News:

Dear Sir: In regard to your article in Motion Picture News about "Bargain Shows" I would like to tell you about the Opera House at Rittman, Ohio.

This theatre recently had Metro's "The Slacker" and ran it with Fatty Arbuckle and some more, making a ten-reel show, charging 22 cents and the war tax.

I saw the first run of "The Slacker" myself and must say that this is a picture which is worth more than twenty-five cents, as you, no doubt know? But running it with three or four reels more hurts the reputation of Metro's and everybody's. Patrons think the feature is not worth the money.

The same manager runs only three or four days a week and admits the children free. Rittman is only a town of 1,500 and I don't see how he is able to make good at it the way he runs his business.

Yours very truly,
ALFRED B. WERHAN.
Wadsworth, Ohio.

Bach Resigns from Universal Company

W. A. Bach, who has completed a tour of the Universal Exchanges installing Publicity Service Departments and also acting as personal representative of the General Manager of Exchanges, has announced his resignation from the Universal Company, to take effect on January 19.

It is understood Mr. Bach has made no definite plans as yet.

WE THANK YOU!

All of You—who wished us a Merry Christmas—and from time to time will pat ourselves by putting your letters in print.

SAYS Exhibitor Walter Davis, of the Herrold Theatre, Herrold, Iowa: "Your issue of December 21st is at hand. Indeed you ask a great deal of a busy exhibitor to stop long enough on Christmas day to write a criticism on your book, but such a worthy publication as the Motion Picture News makes the task very light and a pleasure. I can frankly say that I get all the news and business relations pertaining to the motion picture industry from the Motion Picture News, which is 100 per cent satisfaction to the purchaser. Trust you will have a prosperous New Year."

Abrams-Greene Make Publicity Statement

Greene and Abrams with their consent and knowledge."

Washburn Uses Paralta Plays Studio

America Films Made by New Company

A corporation to be known as Martin Super Art Films Company will shortly be formed in California for the production of twelve-reel subject to be titled "America In Its Making." E. A. Martin is the author of the scenario and will be in charge of filming the production. It is planned that almost a year will be spent in the making, inasmuch as the scenes of the subject will be taken on actual ground where the incidents transpired, in the event the changes have not been so material as to render the locations impossible.

The Norbig studio in Edendale, a suburb of Los Angeles, has been purchased by the company, and the filming of many of the interior scenes will be done here, together with all the laboratory work.

Censorship Issue Again in Baltimore

Mr. Connelly of the Joint Exhibitors' Association, was in Baltimore last week in an effort to bring about a repeal of the censorship law. Theodore Mitchell, general representative for D. W. Griffith, is chairman of the Committee of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry, which has this matter in hand.

Irwin Nails Vanderlip Oversight

Uncovers Problem of Depriving Government of Untold Amount by Advising People to Curtail Amusements—Declares Hoarding Follows, and Then Panic

WALTER W. IRWIN, general manager of the Vitagraph distributing organization, has issued an open letter in which he sounds a note of warning and voices a plea for the safeguarding of the industry in the matter of wartime finance.

This is in reply to recent activities of Frank A. Vanderlip in urging the public to conserve nickels by less frequent visits to the picture theatres.

Mr. Irwin makes the point that in advising the public along this line, Mr. Vanderlip takes one unsound position in that he urges the people to do something that is going to deprive the government coffers of millions of dollars.

Reverse Effect Possible

MR. IRWIN'S statement follows: "In their worthy zeal to raise quickly as much money as possible for the nation's war chests, some of our leading financiers seem to have lost sight of the fact that their statements, instead of bringing out the funds desired, may have the reverse effect of causing the people to hoard their funds. I refer particularly to the recent statement attributed to Frank A. Vanderlip.

"Mr. Vanderlip and others who are urging thrift on the people so strenuously, do so, evidently, on the hypothesis that if the people will deprive themselves and thus accumulate savings, and will put all of their savings into Thrift Stamps, the Government will thereby receive directly a much larger sum than it would obtain through a percentage tax on business.

"If the people followed this advice and put all of their savings into Liberty Bonds or Thrift Stamps, so that the Government could return all of that money to industry, the general effect would probably not be seriously prejudicial, but the fallacy of the hypothesis is that experience shows such preachments produce financial fear, financial fear produces hoarding and hoarding stops business and therefore causes panic.

Encourage Business

"The best way for the Government to assure itself of all the funds necessary to successful conduct of the war is to encourage business in all branches of commercial life and thus keep constantly in circulation the money that is so vital to the economic balance and the national safety. Everything should be done to reassure the people and everything should be avoided that is going to frighten them into withdrawing their money from trade channels and hoarding it. When people are urged to stop spending their money in ordinary lines of commerce the immediate effect is financial stringency and commercial illness, and neither the Government nor industry has the use of the money. Instead, it lies idle and unproductive.

"This is a time when the public, generally speaking, is making more money than at any time in our national history. Wages were never so high. And the public should be urged to spend as much as they do normally and even more, wherever possible. We need to do more business than we did before the war, because the needs of the nation are greater and we have fewer people at home with which to do it.

Only Luxury Curtailed

"It behooves all of us—employers, employees and Government officials to keep trade alive, thus keeping money in circulation. The best way to get revenue for the war fund of the Government is to stimulate increased earnings of labor and capital.

"The only thing which should be curtailed and denied its usual market, if such action is deemed necessary, is actual luxury. By luxury, I mean extravagance and self-indulgence. But clothes, shoes, food and innocent pleasures are necessities and nothing should be done to restrict the purchase of them.

"Entertainment in times like the present is more a necessity than in normal times, not only for the men at the front but for those people who have been left at home. Deprive the people of entertainment now and we would become a nation of brooders. The public mind would be made morose and it would be next to impossible to raise from the depths those persons who have loved ones under arms.

Country Needs Tax

"Every person who goes to a motion picture theatre pays a direct tax to the Government and in addition, every foot of the thousands of feet of film pays a tax. It is to the interest of the nation that the motion picture shall be encouraged, not only as a revenue-producer, but also because it is recognized as the greatest medium for education and thought transmission in the history of mankind.

"Practically every agency of the Government is now employing motion pictures in its war work, the Food Administration, the recruiting branches of the army and navy, the Liberty Loan managers and the Red Crosss all using it to further their individual works and to visualize to the people the things that America is doing in the great struggle for democracy and civilization. The State of New York, following the lead of the National Government, has selected the Vitagraph Company to make a patriotic picture which is to show the people of the nation how the state's great protective machinery has guarded the country's most populated center from danger at the hands of spies and seditionists."

ONE OF MANY

RECENTLY we ran a story telling you of a number of the Merry Xmas wishes that came to Motion Picture News. We'd like to publish for you all of the exhibitor letters that echoed the sentiments—but space is scarce. Here is just one that is typical, however. It's from F. R. Newman, of the Crystal and Queen theatres, Greenville, Texas. He says:

"I am not going to admit that it is or should be necessary on your part to request your readers to wish you and Motion Picture News a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year—for to admit this would to my mind be a clean-cut admission that you and your associates are not the best and most progressive friends that the exhibitor of motion pictures has or have had in this broad land—which same is absolutely true. Your magazine clearly shows that you are leaving no stone unturned which offers a possibility for better conditions. As one reader I want to express my hearty appreciation and to wish you many years of continued and successful effort in your chosen line."

Baltimore Benefit Shows Still Run

It appears, from latest developments in Baltimore, that complaints made by a body of ministers to the Board of Police Commissioners against benefit performances in aid of patriotic causes have not borne fruit. The fact that these shows have been given on Sunday is said to have been the cause for the desire of the ministers to stop them.

Sidney B. Lust, of Super-Film Attractions, Inc., of Washington, wrote the Baltimore Police Commissioners in regard to the complaints, and received the answer that the board is continuing to give favorable consideration to applications for picture entertainments on Sunday, where the same are from patriotic organizations.

Newman Begins Activities in Chicago

E. M. Newman, the lecturer, spent several days last week at the Rothacker laboratory, Chicago, arranging negative continuity for his series of travel pictures which will be made at the Rothacker plant and released through the Educational Films Corporation.

Mr. Newman personally conferred with Mr. Rothacker concerning special tints and duo-tone effects, which characterize his productions.

"Never Shifted"—Exchangeman

Answers "Suitcase Packer's" Article and Insists Politics Has Flown from Branch Offices—All Changes Justified

THE recent article in MOTION PICTURE NEWS labeled "Why Are Exchange Managers Shifted so Frequently?" has called forth at least one very emphatic answer to the question which has puzzled the industry since the advent of branch offices.

This exchangeman, who prefaced his reply with the request to keep his name secret, with the explanation that he is not looking for publicity and his home office does not care to have its branch managers trying to push themselves to the front in this particular fashion, declares that he has never been shifted nor discharged, and has always changed his position of his own accord. He adds that the "suitcase packer's" article is incomplete because it does not answer the question, and proceeds to enlighten the trade "from the standpoint of a man who has been connected with the industry for many years."

"The time was," remarks the exchangeman, "when home office politics dominated the selling forces of nearly every big organization in the business. A new president or a new general sales manager oftentimes meant a wholesale housecleaning of branch managers and the installation of perhaps inefficient men whose only qualifications were their undeniable loyalty to their appointer. I believe that this evil has entirely disappeared. Big corporations are hungry for good, bright, honest, efficient managers who understand the handling of help, the development of salesmen and the general requisites of a business having those peculiar characteristics which make it just a little different than any other big industry of the present day.

"Film corporations do not shift branch managers from one territory to another unless the shift is in the nature of a promotion caused by a vacancy or where a manager has reached the limit of his possibilities and can be of more service to his company and be better compensated in a larger field requiring greater effort. Film corporations do not discharge or change their managers without just and sufficient reasons. Most of us wil lagree to that with a few possible exceptions, and they are practically negligible.

"Film corporations do not molest their branch managers who are 'making good.' A smooth-running organization showing excellent rentals, good collections and a low overhead is rarely disturbed unless the manager suddenly 'hits the toboggan' and the business starts to slide.

"Film corporations do remove dishonest managers of which there have unfortunately been too many for the good of the industry. They remove men who are salesmen but who do not understand even the first rudiments of conserving the companies' money in the matter of overhead expenses; of maintaining through their habits a prestige which commands the respect of those people with whom the exchange does business, and they remove men who go stale on the job and permit the other fellow to tave over many of his valuable accounts when a little salesmanship, a little hard work and much personal inconvenience might have saved it all.

"Film corporations lose most of their branch managers through no fault of the corporation. The majority of managers after one year or two with a company become restless and see greater opportunities in exploiting the product of other companies. They lose confidence in their own goods. They go out and seek and oftentimes they find employment either with some new company (of which there are many appearing on the horizon each sixth month), or they replace some fellow manager who has failed to make good.

"Film corporations also find themselves in the situation of losing good men from time to time through the change of management of one single local exchange. The Blank Company loses a manager who accepts a position with a new company. Then the Blank Company is showered with applications from the "restless boys" and instead of promoting from their own ranks they engage the man who has been local manager for The Atlantic Film Company. And there you go, all the way down the line. Sometimes it reminds me of the proverbial row of dominoes, but the first one and they fall like German soldiers in front of a barrage fire.

"As an exchange manager, I am satisfied that my company is going to retain me as long as I continue to work for their interests in the same way that I have manifested since my connection with them. I don't come down in the morning expecting to find a new man in my chair and I never go home at night worrying about an auditor My books are always open to an auditor, my business is always maintained at a standard that represents the best efforts I have in me and when all is said and done 'What is there to worry about?'

"Perhaps I am one of a few. Perhaps I am not. Let's hear from a few more of you boys who are really grateful for the co-operation you are receiving from your company and who believe that credit for the Changeable Exchange Managers can be laid at the door of the manager himself rather than at the home office."

Silverman Buys "Grain of Dust"

"If it's a Crest picture I know that it measures up to the Carlo E. Carlton idea of what a big feature ought to be, and that's enough for me to know," is what Mayer Silverman, of Pittsburgh, is said to have written, in placing his order for the new Crest feature, "The Grain of Dust," a film version of the David Graham Phillips novel, starring Lillian Walker.

The announcement declares that Silverman, who is known as an exhibitor and exchange man, who possesses an uncany sense of the public demand, always makes up his mind regarding a new picture with the minimum waste of time, but he has surpassed his previous record in taking "The Grain of Dust."

He was so certain that a picture with the Crest stamp and the Carlton endorsement would go big, that he bought it sight unseen. He has not so much as seen photographs from the film.

He did not even wait for a contract, but took the film, enclosed a check which represents the highest figure Silverman has ever paid for a feature in his territory.

"Orders of this sort make it apparent that exhibitors are alive to the value of 'The Grain of Dust' as a money-getter, said Carlton. Picture-wise exhibitors know that we have an absolutely top-notch picture. One that will prove a box-office success, and we are glad that the exhibitors are realizing their opportunity."

Fuel Scare

National Fuel Administrator Garfield that all amusements be closed three days of the week. However, this move remains still as a suggestion and not as an order, and the meeting came to the conclusion that no definite steps would be taken in this direction without orders driect from Fuel Administrator Garfield.

New York Ice Bound

New York City is practically ice-bound. Ice floes are jammed in the Hudson, and access to the piers by tugs and other carriers of fuel from points in Jersey is practically cut off. A blizzard which has raged in the States west of New Jersey, obstructing all traffic in the Central States, has stopped the supply of the fuel and other supplies. This means that supplies of fuel are practically cut off from New York. With these conditions facing the city it is more than likely that quick action will be taken on the conservation of the meager supply of coal which New York has. It is reported that several large industries will be compelled to close within the next few days unless the fuel problem is solved. The National Fuel Administration has ruled that all industries necessary to the carrying out of the nation's work must go on at the expense of the other industries not necessary. The motion picindustries not necessary.

Important Conference Saturday

At the conference January 12 were Albert T. Wiggin, State Fuel Administrator; Harry T. Peters, chairman of the State Conservation Committee; Reeve Schley, City Administrator; Alfred H. Smith, Eastern Railroad Director; Joseph A. Hall and Frederick E. Gunnison, Fuel Administrators for the burroughs of Bronx and Brooklyn, and F. L. Kracke, Public Service Commissioner.

The order which will close all theatres for three days each week if placed into effect will affect only those using bituminous coal. It is said that all use this grade of coal, and it will affect practically every theatre and place of amusement in the city and State.

The order if made will be in effect only so long as New York is unable to get a sufficient supply of coal to operate her essential industries. It may be in effect two weeks or longer.

Kalem Laboratory Proves a Friend

While scarcity of coal and lack of electric current caused many motion picture laboratories in New York and vicinity to curtail operations during the recent cold spell, the Kalem laboratory in Twenty-third street helped out many producers in distress.

"We were obliged to work night shifts in our laboratory last week," said William Wright, the Kalem secretary-treasurer, "not that our big capacity was taxed, but because the cold snap caught several producers with release dates near at hand and their laboratories frozen. Our laboratory and its operation are so thoroughly systematized that although we were in the midst of printing and developling hundreds of subjects for the Government, we handled all the rush orders in record time."

Government to Have Display at Exposition

General Manager Frederick H. Elliott of the Motion Picture Exposition and the Executive Secretary of the National Secretary of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry, made a flying trip to Washington, D. C., the early part of last week, and succeeded in making arrangements for an official exhibit at the forthcoming exposition, which will take place in the Grand Central Palace, February 2 to 10. Mr. Elliott conferred with Howard E. Coffin of the Aircraft Board and the Council of National Defense, with the result that when the exposition opens one of the big attractions will be an army airplane from which motion pictures have been taken at the front and many of the pictures so taken will he shown.

What Kind of a Fellow Is—Irwin?

Being a Glance at the Real Human Side of the Big Men of the Picture Game Caught in Action

By William A. Johnston

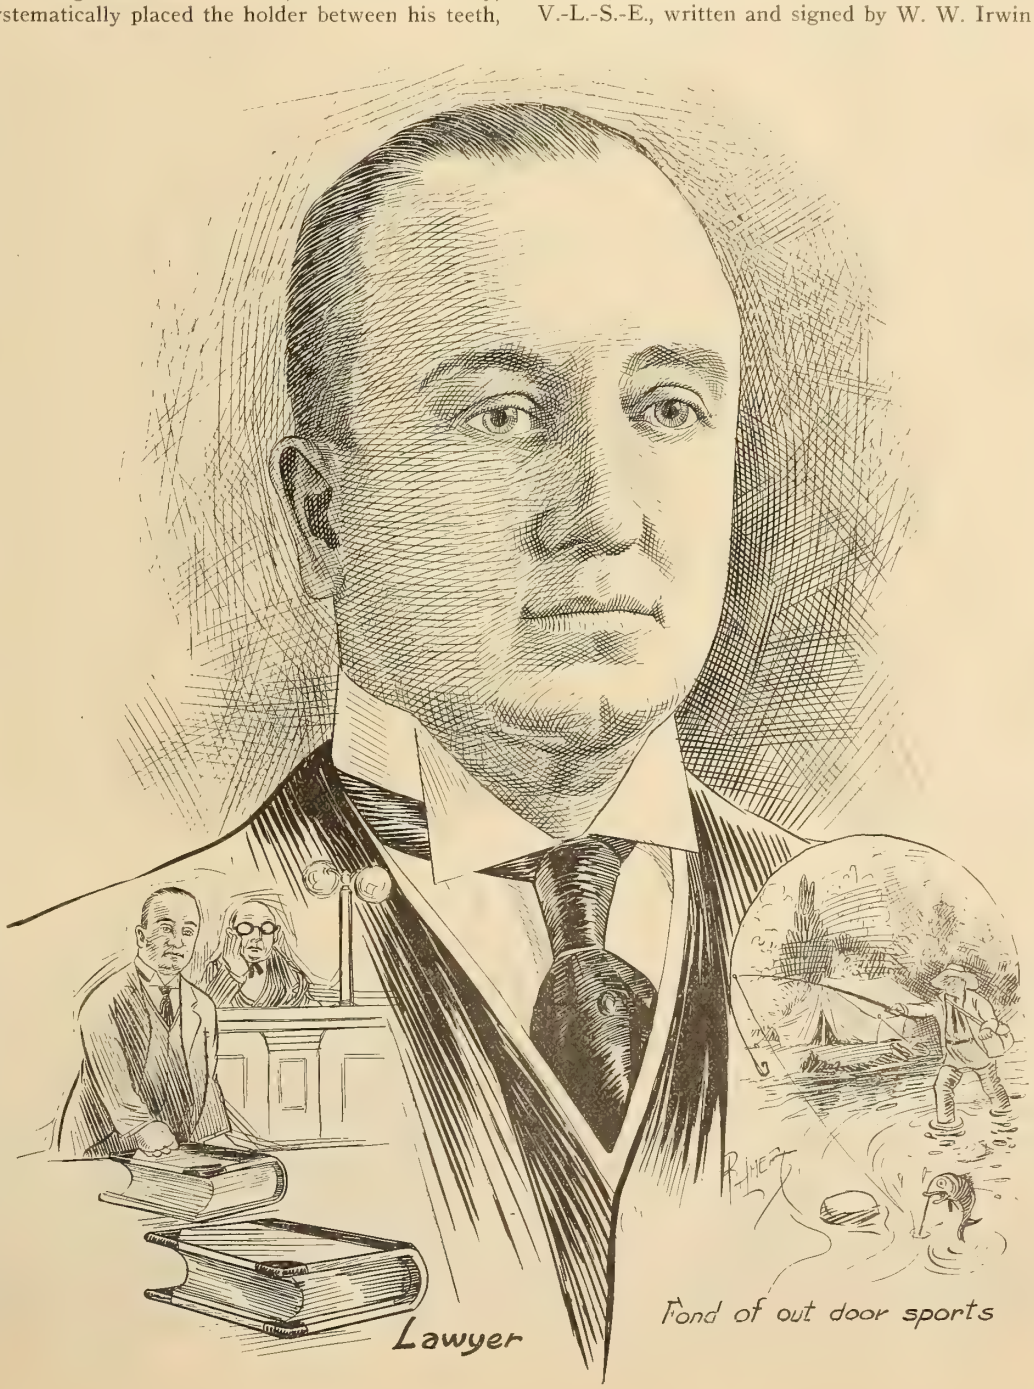
W. W. IRWIN is a lawyer. Here we interject a remark. Once we heard a man spoken of as a good lawyer among film men and a good film man among lawyers.

Mr. Irwin is not that kind of a man. Hardly.

For one thing he neither reflects nor caters to his environment. He is just what he is. Speaking of camouflage, he's its living antonym.

Our idea of Mr. Irwin is a man—be he lawyer, film man, physician, merchant or what not—who sights an object and then goes after it somewhat like a British tank, regardless of hell, high water, trenches, concrete pill boxes, Van Hindenburgs, and other German obstacles. Mr. Irwin is sturdy.

Nevertheless he is legal—from his well-polished shoes to the tip of his judicial brow.



When he deliberately, judiciously and systematically inserted a Richmond straight cut cigarette into a holder, and as deliberately, judiciously and systematically placed the holder between his teeth, his whole attitude said: "Now, Gentlemen of the Jury, you have heard the evidence. We look for a verdict upon the merits of the case. But be logical—damn you (if one may swear at a jury) BE LOGICAL."

You must be sure of your premises with Mr. Irwin; so we began cautiously. Whatever hopes we had of being jaunty and flippant we carefully concealed.

"This, Mr. Irwin," we said firmly, "is an interview."

Mr. Irwin pulled deliberately and systematically upon the Richmond straight cut (his smokes like his clothes, friendships, policies and principles are chosen, almost contracted for, with a terrific singleness of purpose). We watched the cigarette and waited, knowing that our premise was being sounded to its lowermost, and that the conclusion would hit us straight between the eyes.

It did.

"Exactly," said Mr. Irwin—finally. "Have you got your facts?"

Zip! We got it, right in an interviewer's solar plexus.

"Have you got your facts?" We were minded to tell Mr. Irwin that we were preparing an interview not a brief. Facts? What have they to do with an interview? We struggled to revert to the premise. We tried to look obstinate—and sturdy. But we have sat on commmittees with Mr. Irwin when he asked for facts; so we shook hands, picked up our hat and went out—for facts!

We had some; we got others from other film men; and we got a mouthful from his assistant manager, Goff, who works days, nights and Sundays with Mr. Irwin, lunches on ice cream with him when Mr. Irwin insists, and is generally at his side except in a motor car. Mr. Irwin's driving of an automobile, it appears, is not as straight cut as his cigarette.

First, we find that a statement of the aims and policies of V.-L.-S.-E., written and signed by W. W. Irwin in June, 1915, has been carried out to every letter. This does not surprise us. As a side-stepper Mr. Irwin reminds us of Grover Cleveland. We expect to see these policies go right on when films are no more.

Mr. Irwin is not cold—it's only a logical exterior. Ask any employee about his big-heartedness.

He is not obstinate — except when he knows he's right and you can't tell him otherwise.

He hates a liar.

He never hedges himself and expects no one else to.

He will not tolerate politics in business.

He works with his organization and his organization with him—result: 100 per cent.

He knows the tricks of the business, but despises them.

He puts every man he meets—even the little ones—on a big plane. His business religion is to elevate those under him.

Honorable mention for thoroughness.

Producers Conserve in 1917

Statistics Show That Nearly 800 Reels Less Were Made During Past Year Than Formerly—More Features

STATISTICS compiled by distributors during the past week disclose that motion picture producers abided by the conservation slogan in 1917, and made 774 reels less last year than in 1916.

Cranston Brenton, chairman of the National Board of Review of Motion Pictures, attributed the decrease, in a statement concerning the condition, to two factors, both due to the war.

"The chief falling off in production," Mr. Brenton said, "was during the month preceding and the two months following the declaration of hostilities against Germany. Evidently at that time the producers were uncertain as to what the effect of the war would be on their industry. Since July, however, the production has maintained the average set in former years.

"The number of films released has been somewhat smaller, but there is a growing demand for features of five reels. The one-reel picture is rapidly losing its popularity. The best illustration of this tendency is the fact that the average length of pictures in 1915 was 1.75 reels; in 1916, 2.23 reels and in 1917, 2.77 reels. In December the average length was 3.28 reels, compared to 2.28 for December, 1916.

"The second factor in the decrease in productions was the large amount of government propaganda disseminated by the motion picture theatres. The great value of the motion picture as a medium of expression of opinion has been clearly demonstrated."

Directors Choose Officers for the Year

Try for New York Censorship Again

Reports from Albany indicate that reformers who have been labelled "the Christian lobby" will probably introduce a new bill providing for state censorship of motion pictures in the recently convened legislature.

No advance forecast of the terms of the bill has been given. As the reform group plans the introduction of twenty-five other quack bills, reforming everything from Sunday groceries to newspaper sporting pages, the motion picture bill will probably not see the light of day for a month or so.

Resolutions Adopted at Wisconsin Meeting

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Wisconsin at its regular meeting in Milwaukee on January 4, resolved that: we approve of, and are in hearty accord with the resolutions adopted by the Washington convention, and pledge our united support in bringing to a successful end the relief sought, and so sorely needed at this time, and especially do we condemn: (1) the deposit system; (2) the present exorbitant high prices of certain pictures, whatever the cause of same; (3) the placing of the 15c per reel manufacturers' tax on the exhibitor by some distributors. And we respectfully ask that the Revenue War Tax Bill be repealed or so amended as to place the tax where it was intended.

"Be it further resolved, that we show our appreciation to those manufacturers and distributors who have not levied the footage tax, by patronizing them whenever possible."

Wisconsin exhibitors were urged to send immediately to the Allied Legislative Committee, in Indianapolis, information showing decrease in business.

G. M. Anderson, who created the "Broncho Billy" of screen fame, has announced his intention of returning to pictures in a series of features of Western life. This plunge into the range of the camera will be for only a short time, it is said, as Mr. Anderson's legitimate productions require much of his time.

The first feature picture to be released is entitled "Naked Hands," and is in five parts.

LUMINOUS PAINT FOR NIGHT SIGNS

What Terry Ramsaye Brought to Light in the Bottom of His Trunk

TERRY RAMSAYE, advertising manager of the Mutual Film Corporation, blew into MOTION PICTURE NEWS office one day last week and told the editors that while delving in his trunk recently he found a luminous plate, the kind that is used in decoying fish on dark nights.

With all of the gloomy rumors that have been flying around regarding lightless nights for theatres, Mr. Ramsaye hit upon the idea of theatre signs painted with luminous paint, which stores light in daytime and radiates at night.

He had a sign prepared and placed at the end of an alley a block long. The night was black. He could read the sign easily a block distant!

Where there are many street lights near a theatre front, Mr. Ramsaye says the signs won't luminate.

But for the neighborhood theatre, where streets are dark, the idea is excellent.

Mr. Exhibitor, does this give you an idea?

"Screen Telegram" on the Way

Scheduled to Make Debut Through Mutual on March 4 as Twice-a-Week News Reel—Supplants the Weekly

JOHN R. FREULER, of the Mutual Film Corporation, has announced the coming of a new reel, which will make its appearance twice a week on and after March 4, according to present plans. The subject of the reel will be general news, under the title of "The Screen Telegram." Mr. Freuler advises it will follow up and supplant the Mutual Weekly.

"We have laid elaborate and promising plans for the production and assembling of 'The Screen Telegram,'" said Mr. Freuler, discussing the new release at his New York offices. "We have arranged for an extensive system of foreign camera correspondence with a war news service from some new angles, which we expect will give an unusual attractiveness to the reel.

"I have been giving the news reels particular attention for a long period and I have come to the conclusion it has been a rather neglected field among the film producers. Improvements in this field have been very slow to come. Yet the enduring success of the Mutual Weekly and some of its better competitors, and their obvious value to the best theatres, prove the permanence of demand and encourage our hopes for the new venture.

"The mechanical work of the Screen Telegram will be handled at the laboratories and printing plant of the American Film Company, Inc. This means that the Screen Telegram reels will be of the same high physical quality as the feature productions of the concern released through the Mutual Film Corporation."

Vitagraph Appoints Hendrick

Succeeds Gordon Laurence as Sales Promotion Manager, and Will in Addition Edit the Weekly House Publication

J. LAWTON KENDRICK, one of the best known young men in New York, and who has a wide acquaintance in theatrical, newspaper and business circles, has been appointed Sales Promotion Manager of the Vitagraph distributing organization to succeed Gordon Laurence, now in training for the Naval Reserve Flying Corps.

Mr. Kendrick was formerly sales manager for the Stewart-Hartshorne Company, roller shade manufacturers, but for several years has devoted his attention to editing and publishing two trade journals covering the upholstery and tobacco fields, respectively.

In announcing the engagement of Mr. Kendrick, Vitagraph said: "Since his graduation from the University of Pennsylvania, Mr. Kendrick has traveled several times around the world and has been a careful student of trade conditions and sales methods. He has acted as advisor on numerous big sales campaigns for national advertisers, has made special industrial surveys for the government and has appeared before Congress in connection with various trade subjects. He also has addressed many leading trade bodies on subjects of vital interest to them."

As part of his work as Sales Promotion Manager, Mr. Kendrick will edit "The Vitagraph Family," a weekly house publication devoted to Vitagraph efficiency and service.

Tax Blamed for Closings in Cleveland

The past fortnight has marked the closing of three motion picture theatres in Cleveland because of the tax on admission tickets, according to a correspondent of MOTION PICTURE NEWS. One was the Castle theatre in Wade Park avenue, which was one of the oldest neighborhood houses in that vicinity. Exhibitor Scheifleinheimer had operated the house for more than four years. The Dante, in Central avenue, and the Family theatre, in Quincy avenue, were the other two closed.

Backer to Launch Cooperative Booking Plan

FRANKLYN E. BACKER, president Mammoth Film Corporation, who purchased recently the Greater New York rights to the Mayfair production, "Persuasive Peggy," featuring Peggy Hyland, announces that with the release of this feature he will inaugurate his plan of co-operative booking with the exhibitor. Mr. Backer acquired the New York rights through Schallenberger and Priest, special representatives and sales agents for Mayfair in the disposition of their product.

Mr. Backer said:

"The exhibitor's rental will be calculated upon the cost of each picture to Mr. Backer's firm, plus a nominal percentage for handling. Each print will be so routed as to cover a given number of dates per annum as long as it will earn a fair return. I will be glad to outline his plan in detail to any exhibitor who is interested in saving money on special features.

"Marcus Loew has booked 'Persuasive Peggy' to open on his circuit January 28 under the Backer co-operative plan. This fact alone is a splendid indorsement of the plan, as Mr. Loew is recognized as a keen business man in the exhibition end of the business."

War Films on Hand

The Hearst-Pathe News, which has shown several special pictures of various phases of the war and the training of soldiers, announced this week that it has many other films on hand showing the training of the American troops in the various branches of modern warfare. The company states that all of the films were made in the training camp of the American troops in France.

Philadelphia Anniversaries Are Numerous

Anniversaries in Philadelphia have been numerous of late. The chief theatres which announced them are the Strand and the Colonial.

Nixon's Colonial theatre, the Germantown playhouse, celebrates the fourth anniversary last week and the occasion was observed in a most befitting manner. During the four years of this theatre it has become the home of the very best in motion pictures and has carried to the residents of Germantown, Tioga, Logan, Manayunk, Chestnut Hill, Roxborough and the surrounding territory the highest standards in entertainment.

New Year's week marked the first anniversary of the Strand theatre. Since the opening of this theatre the people of North Philadelphia have been offered only the best film productions made. It is estimated that during the first year of its existence, there have been approximately a million persons entertained in this house. A feature of the Strand is its organ.

Picture Shows How Canada Met Harvest

Louis Kon, Commissioner of Immigration and Colonization for the Province of Manitoba, has been engaged recently in Chicago in the production of a film for which he drafted the story, showing how Canada, and particularly Manitoba, went about solving the labor-shortage problem at harvest time.

"Do Your Bit on the Farm" is a thousand-foot reel, partly produced in Winnipeg.

The film will be released by Mr. Kon at cost to the State Councils of Defense in the United States to be used in solving the labor-shortage problem here, it is said. Canadian distributing franchise.

"Grain of Dust" Stars Lillian Walker

Lillian Walker is star of the picture and Miss Day was cast in a supporting role.

Gale Henry Transfers to L-Ko Company

Carrying out his purpose to strengthen the drawing powers of his trade mark by adding comedy stars, President Julius Stern, of L-Ko, has arranged for a transfer of Gale Henry from Nestor comedies, a Universal brand, to head an L-Ko company directed by Archie Mayo. Mr. Stern, who is on a business trip to Hollywood, where L-Kos come from, made the arrangements and announces an early release of Miss Henry's first comedy.

Another engagement calls for the appearances of Mack ("Ambrose") Swain in a series of comedies directed by W. S. Fredericks. The first of the Ambrose pictures have been released, and "Sherlock Ambrose," a detective comedy, is now in the making.

Canadian Pessimism Flees Before Pictures

According to announcements made this week by the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation, the exploitation in Canada, both by means of billboards and the daily publications of the special productions, "The Zeppelin's Last Raid," "Those Who Pay" and "The Belgian," has done much to dispel the pessimism which obtained in Dominion film circles.

R. P. Madden, who recently went to eastern Canada as special representative of the booking corporation, has returned to New York after launching the U. S. productions in a majority of the principal cities of the Dominion. He will remain here a few days and then return to Toronto, where he will take charge of the distribution of U. S. subjects, making his permanent headquarters in the Toronto offices of the Superfeatures, Ltd., to which company has been allotted the Canadian distributing franchise after seeing the first two numbers.

Manitoba Faces New Tax on Amusements

At the session of the Manitoba legislature, convening in Winnipeg, January 17, a bill is expected to be introduced by Hon Edward Brown, provincial treasurer, providing for an amusement tax which is to be 20 per cent. of the cost of the admission ticket. The profits are to go toward the provincial revenue.

A Winnipeg exhibitor said: "It can't possibly be a 20 per cent. tax. If it is it will just be about 20 per cent. more than the theatres are making in profit at the present time.

Rothermel Brothers Now in the Army

Addison J. Rothermel, director of the Walt Mason single reel, human interest stories, has left for Canada to join the Royal Flying Corps. His brother, Royale V. Rothermel, president of the Filmcraft Corp., is at present in France directing the distribution of motion picture propaganda and amusement film for the American and French fronts.

January Shows Business Is Picking Up

According to all figures available, December proved one of the worst months for business ever experienced by the exhibitors in the Province of Ontario. There have been very few but have been able to show a loss for this month. Things happened in quick succession to the detriment of business generally in the film trade.

Among these might be mentioned, the usual Christmas rush. This came after the Canadian Victory Loan and the easy terms of payment prompted many to discontinue going to the theatres. Shortly after this Loan was concluded, Toronto was visited by one of the worst blizzards in many years.

January, however, has got off to a good start and it looks as if the first month of the year will be especially kind to the moving picture theatres.

Animated Songs Feature Universal Stars

It became known this week that a series of twelve animated songs made at Universal City under the direction of Harry Cohn will have Universal stars featured in the 500-foot subject.

The stars and songs in which they appear are as follows: Franklyn Farnum, "Over There," "Homeward Bound" and "It's a Long Way to Berlin"; Eddie Lyons and Lee Moran, "I Don't Want to Get Well"; Carmel Myers, "Sandomingo"; Ben Wilson and Neva Gerber, "My Sweetie" and "Meet Me at the Station"; Neal Hart, "One Day in June"; Little Zoe Rae, "Just a Baby's Prayer at Twilight"; Dorothy Phillips, "Bluebird"; Kenneth Harlan, "A Dixie Boy Is Missing," and Monroe Salisbury and Ruth Clifford, "The Mason-Dixon Line."

The entire series has been contracted for initial showing at the Pantages theatres of the West Coast and the mountain states, Mr. Pantages having made the contract

Maryland Asks Repeal of Censorship

The Maryland Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, regarding the question of censorship which is to come up at the present legislature in Annapolis, has outlined its plan of procedure in urging the repeal of the law as follows:

"Repeal of the State Board of Motion Picture Censors' law will be asked of the present General Assembly. The law has been given fair trial, and having been found wanting on many grounds, especially as a large revenue producer for the state, its wiping out will be asked, largely on the plea that it gives opportunity to gag one of the largest sources of public expression. A bill has been prepared carrying a repeal of the law and this will be introduced in both the House and Senate within the next few weeks.

"For several months the motion picture people of the state have been feeling out public sentiment in Baltimore city and in all the counties with the result that they are confident that the censor law is an unpopular measure from many standpoints.

"The repeal of the law is not desired that the gateways of motion picture houses may be opened for the exhibition of any sort or character of picture, especially of the sort that might tend to debase the morals of the community. Instead, there are existing laws that will protect the public against the showing of improper pictures. The police now have power to stop the exhibition of any improper screen picture, just as they can stop any theatrical exhibition regarded as improper or immoral. The police do not stop to argue the propriety of the exhibition, but merely make the arrests and the matter is left to a judge and jury.

"The censor law has been in operation since the summer of 1916 and has operated in Baltimore city and throughout the state. There have been numerous complaints against pictures shown on the screen, even though many such pictures have borne the patent evidence that they had been passed upon by the Censor Board.

"One of the strongest arguments used in favor of repeal is that the law gives opportunity for a small group of individuals to pass upon the views and tastes of the community and to arbitrarily say what the public shall and shall not see without the public being given an opportunity to voice its own views.

"The Exhibitors' League of Maryland, representing motion pictures producers of the state, has been organized and will carry the fight to Annapolis and through the assembly. The league has opened headquarters at 210 West Lexington street and has issued a pamphlet on 'State Censorship—What It Means.' The books dwells with emphasis on Article 40 of the Maryland Constitution."

You are not going to war. The men who are need all the comforts you can give them. Help them get cigarettes. That is your patriotic duty. If you aren't helping in the "smokes" campaign, get busy—now. Don't be a slacker!

A NEW MEXICO SURPRISE PARTY

How the Up-and-Coming Town of Alamagordo Was Outdistanced in Wits by an Exhibitor Who Knew a Thing or Two About the Law, By Gum!

SOME ONE threw a monkey wrench into the cog-wheels of the throbbing and purring administrative machinery of that thriving young community, Alamagordo, New Mexico, which reposes on the hot and dusty bosom of our celebrated American Southwest.

Stephen Kimball, proprietor of the only picture show in town, got the laugh on the city dads.

It seems that Alamagordo (which is not a nick-name) recently suffered from a wave of reform: the local patriarchs passed an ordinance prohibiting pictures on Sunday.

Steve, noting that Sunday was bright and shining, opened for business as usual.

Good and mad the town had its star cop camping on Steve's front stoop Monday A. M. He was escorted, amid loud buzzings, right down the main street to the cooler.

Steve looked the jedge square in the eye, and claimed that no such ordinance existed, all because the mayor had never signed it!

A scramble was made for the records. Steve was right!

At last reports Alamagordo is still roaring.

Bach Tells of War Conditions

Says Whole Country Is Under Fog So Thick It Is Hard to Estimate Which Way Things Will Turn —Little Fellow Hit

"A DENSE war-fog is hanging over the entire country," declared W. A. Bach, who a few days ago returned to New York after a trip taking four months' time and covering Chicago, Denver, St. Louis, Portland, San Francisco and many other of the larger centres of the country.

"So dense is this fog that it is mighty hard to estimate or say definitely that this or that twist in events will take place," continued Mr. Bach. "The exhibitors in the larger cities have not felt the effects of recent developments so severely as their smaller brothers in the towns and villages, if an average is taken of the country at large. But the little fellow has certainly had a solar plexus wallop that has left him gasping. The effect of this drive, which includes war taxes and conscription after-effects, together with general conditions, has resulted in a really alarming reduction of show nights in the smaller towns.

"Exchange executives in a position to note records must have watched with anxiety the closing off of one night here, two nights here, and this theatre only showing Saturday and Sunday. To my mind this is the only source of real worry. The average exhibitor outside of the bigger-city men, only figures on two profit nights a week, either Saturday and Sunday or Friday and Saturday in a closed-Sunday section. And there it does not mean so much to them to cut off a single week-night, upon which they usually do little more than break even. But to the producer and distributor it represents a distinct problem, because it means a curtailment of his market. And, naturally, curtailment of market or outlet means curtailment of production in war times, when it is practically impossible to increase or intensify sales effort.

"Speaking of reducing markets, it seems to me that a lot of us have forgotten that we are at war. Every other industry has been faced with a decreasing market owing to war conditions and in practically every industry production has been faced with a decreasing market owing to war conditions and in practically every industry production has been reduced to meet these conditions and the requirements of economy and governmental requests for conservatism. And if the production has not been cut it has been diverted to purely war uses.

"Both producers and exhibitors would fare better with about 50 per cent of the production now running—better prices would obtain for both and the war tax would not be the "last straw" to the exhibitor, which it unfortunately is in many cases, I am convinced from my observations in the country.

"What will help? Well, the first thing in my mind that seems imperative is to forget the impression that is only too prevalent right now; that our industry is going smash. We are not going smash if we recognize the existencies of war time and settle down to an era of conservation, forgetting for awhile our pre-war dreams of expansion."

Campbell's Daughter Is Non-Professional

In an account of the recent death of Eric Campbell in MOTION PICTURE NEWS it was erroneously stated that the comedian, a member of Charlie Chaplin's organization, is survived by Laura Austin, a daughter. Miss Austin is the wife of Albert Austin, a member of the company, and is not Campbell's daughter according to advice from the Coast. Miss Una Campbell is the surviving daughter, and she is not in the profession.

Handicapping Your Advertising

Things That You Should Not Do If You Expect Your Theatre To Get Real Results

ADVERTISING is supposed to be an incentive to attract the public to see your picture, but there are lots of cases when the displays might just as well have been written with the intention of keeping the patrons away—for by all the logic of advertising they are going to achieve that effect.

We devotde one of these articles to "Hitting the High Spots." We told you there to drive the central idea home, to stamp one idea on the public mind; in other words, to advertise with a purpose. Whether profit has been taken from this advice or not a general inspection of the motion picture houses in the newspapers which regularly come to our attention show a marked improvement over three months ago. Yet there is room for much further advance.

Here is our advice: Unless you know what you want to say, stay away from advertising entirely. You are like a fellow jumping from a steamer into the mid-ocean and believing that you are going to get back home.

If what you are doing means nothing to you, certainly it means nothing to the public.

We advise using big space for your advertising, but space itself isn't the thing; it's what you put in it, and what you refrain from putting in it.

Some advertising really handicaps the picture's success. You had better simply announce the title and the date and let it go at that instead of aimlessly attempting to use up the inches of display matter that you have contracted for.

Make up your mind to one thing at the start. The general public does not want to read everything that you have to say, if your display is written like an old maid telling the latest town gossip. You may think that after you have written a lot of matter that it sounds mighty fine and that you have achieved a masterpiece, but you will find that it is not generally known because of the few people who have read it. Better to say one-tenth as much and have it read.

That is one serious handicap to advertising. Take the instance of the Butterfly theatre, illustrated on the opposite page. Butterfly does some clever advertising week after week and we are surprised to see this space filled with a mere mass of matter. How much stronger this would have been if the writer had used the matter that is in wide type and then the sentence—"A pageant of life and love, a panorama of passion in the burning desert where men and women, too, may love more fervently than in any other place." Then you would have had something to attract attention—something to make people read the display and something to arouse their curiosity so that they would come to the theatre to find what it was all about. Instead of that the mass of type repels the eye, and you have lost fifty per cent of your possible readers at the start. You have at least handicapped your possible patronage.

In direct contrast, and appearing just below this display in the same paper, is the advertisement of Marguerite Clark in "The Seven Swans." Certainly as much could have been said about this picture as the other, had the writed decided to tell "the whole story," but he told the essentials and brought the people to the theatre to see the rest.

Yet there are cases when additional reading matter, when placed in a position that does not jar, and which is evidently secondary matter, can be used to excellent advantage. Take the display on the same picture prepared by the Columbia theatre. In this case one of the cuts supplied by Paramount was used, but the writer has added the lines headed "And There You'll Find Your Old Sweetheart Again." Here is brought in an added appeal to the grown-ups, which was touched on in the Alhambra display, but given more of a heart appeal here.

A third display on a Marguerite Clark picture is that of the Eckel theatre, one of our best advertisers. Here he has used the picture of the star as his main drawing card, and he has done this with artistic effect. He has said as little as possible, but he has told the public all it wants to know; and that's a mighty good time to quit.

Victoria theatre has handicapped itself by making its display hard to read, objectionable in type selections and a succession of display lines that confuse. If the Victoria felt that it had to call attention in detail to the vaudeville features it should have used three times as much space and have boxed off the various vaudeville features. Evidently the writer believed his feature picture the greatest attraction or he would not have given it the top position, but he should have made it dominate.

Get this little point:

A woman will hunt through the small type of a department store advertisement because she is hunting for bargains. She may need only a piece of ribbon, but as long as she is going to the department store she is going to read through the list of things and see what other bargains she can pick up.

But that is not the case with motion pictures, especially beyond the feature picture. Advertising should not be written on the theory that the public will hunt up your space and read through the small print to find what it is looking for. The only right theory on which to plan this advertising is on the theory that you want to reach the people who have to be pulled to your theatre. Those who follow your house blindly may find out in some way without any advertising what you are showing. You can almost ignore that percentage in getting up your display. We know one publicity man who always has this idea in mind when he writes a display: "How can I bring a new patron to my theatre this week?" And that's a good idea.

Just be governed by the idea that you are writing this display as a distinct appeal to one lone individual who has never been to your theatre. You want to make it as striking as possible, and you have got to get something that will catch his eye. You can't tire him with descriptive matter, for he will get disgusted before he gets to the end. You can't bunk him because he is probably suspicious of that. You have got to arouse his curiosity and his interest to make him want to come.

Gift's theatre seems to have but one idea in mind, and that is to sprinkle the name of the theatre around as much as possible. It reminds us of the displays in the cheaper publications where "Free! Free! Free!" is used all around in big type and after one reads the small print one finds that there isn't anything free about it. Not that we mean that Gift's is trying to bunk the public, but it is handicapping itself by using that space with the name of the theatre (instead of a neat name plate) instead of bringing out the catch line, or something that the picture tells. Here was a picture with ample fields for advertising, but all of these have been deliberately passed up, unless we take into consideration the small type at the bottom.

Sun has a good display, but we would have used in considerably larger type the line "She Is Omaha's Own Star." It would have appealed to the civic pride of many people who were probably hesitating which picture they would see that day.

And this brings another point to mind. We have been watching carefully for months the advertisements of the leading theatres of the country, large and small, and we have come upon an unbelievably small number that have made any reference to the fact that noted stars that they were advertising were home products. Here is a point that should always be featured. Don't say to yourself that everybody knows that Jennie Jones was born in your town, but go after the people that do not know it, and even if they do know it keep reminding them of it.

Seeing the Rialto with Rothapfel

ORDINARILY it is a dangerous thing to say that any bill at the Rialto is the "greatest ever," but we are not going to pause on the brink this week, for Mr. Rothapfel has certainy set a new mark in motion picture entertainment and is presenting a bill that is almost beyond the dream of possible accomplishments. He is working pictures and light and music and chorus effects to their fullest power to achieve a novelty that distinctly startles. No, with the success of the Rivoli, Rothapfel has not "let down"—he has gone a daring pace further and has distinctly "made good."

The overture this week, under the direction of Dr. Hugo Reisenfeld, consists of selections from "Lohengrin." After the orchestra has played a number of selections with splendid effect, the audience is given a big surprise. The center curtain parts reveal the Rialto female chorus of twelve and at the same moment the Rialto male chorus appears before the display panels at either side, costumed as Knights of the Holy Grail. Then were sung the bridal song and finale with the effect that the audience went wild in its enthusiasm and the applause was so hearty and continuous that it brought a smile to the face of the director. It is probably the most effective handling of an operating number in the history of a motion picture house.

Then followed one of the splendid Robert Bruce-Educational pictures, "The Trail of the Sky." It embraces an unusually large number of splendid bits, including mountain scenery and several charming reflection "shots." It is a notable fact that Rothapfel is showing these Bruce pictures—different ones, of course—at both theatres. The particularly effective music for this number was the first two numbers of "In the Mountains," suite and the andante.

With the dark blue light effect through the house the curtains again parted, revealing Signor Bonelli in East Indian costume, seated. At the same moment the curtains of the display panels parted, showing East Indian scenes, they, too, bathed in dark blue. Then followed a most effective rendition of "Temple Bells," an Indian love lyric, accompanied by the Rialto male chorus, which did not appear on the stage.

Rialto Animated this week is devoted to patriotism and every number of it got a big hand. There isn't any comedy in it because there is a splendid two-reel Mack Sennett on the same bill and the greater part of the feature is comedy. The weekly opens with the Lord Mayor's show in London, including the big military parade, during which was played "Sons of Britain," in which there is a counterpoint of "God Save the King." Then followed unusual pictures of the Rockland, Me., fire, shown with a new fire allegro arranged by Dr. Reisenfeld, with the effects and the flashing of the red lights above the proscenium. The Bellevue Hospital life-saving unit was shown to a one-step, and then followed army trucks en route to Berlin to the tune of "I'm Going to Follow the Boys." With the "Return of the Regiment March" and a touch of "In Old Virginia" came pictures of the War Council and Secretary Baker and then official pictures of a machine gun squad in France. This faded into a cartoon, showing the Kaiser, drunk, trying to find the keyhole of peace. The same music followed through this. Next was a cleved map-cartoon, together with quotations from the President's speech, illustrating the war aims. The various titles got prolonged applause and there were continuous cries when there flashed on the screen the statement that the country was ready to make every sacrifice. A few bars of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" were played just before the picture was shown and continued through the first part, and then came the motif of "Democracy," the opening number of the Rivoli. Now note the linking up: Next, after the statement of these war aims, came pictures of our boys marching down Broadway, with "Goodbye Broadway, Hello France," almost bringing the audience to its feet. The magazine ended with a Hy Mayer cartoon, entitled "When Peace Comes, She Will Not Come Alone," first showing the figure of Peace and then World Democracy following. The "Democracy" theme was repeated with the full orchestra.

Singing in English the first time at the Rialto, Mlle. D'Espinoy appeared with the male chorus, singing the Ratapan aria from "The Daughter of the Regiment." At the first part of this there was the tri-color effect in the lighting of the stage and at the sides, there was a touch of red, and the main lighting system carried out the same effect.

Now here is a point that shows why the Rothapfel efforts are always successful. During the first presentation of this number, the members of the chorus were very straggling in their salute. Mr. Rothapfel, who was behind the stage at the time, was wild over the error, and after the number he called them into his office. "I can always excuse a mistake," he told them, "but never a bonehead." And they took the advice in the spirit that it was meant, when he added: "You'll be in the chorus all your lives if you don't use your brains." For the chorus men, as all of his other employes, know that he is really interested in their success.

A French-Canadian lumberjack song is one of the themes played with the feature, George Beban in "Jules of the Strong Heart," a picture that got more applause than any that we have noted at the Rialto in weeks. Rothapfel accomplished another novelty during the storm scenes in this picture by using flashes of white through the proscenium arch, where there are the outlets of the big organ. It gave the effect of the audience literally being out in the storm.

The orchestra then played the "Rakoczy March" from "The Damnation of Faust" with the house bathed in red and the flashes of red carrying out the effect.

The bill ends with a Mack Sennett-Paramount comedy, "The Kitchen Lady," for which light music was used. It is a screamingly funny bit with a cat, a bear and fish contributing their part to the work of the human actors.

Yes, it was a wonderful bill and it was put on with about an hour's rehearsal. Would you believe that? It is because Rothapfel is always working, always bringing his organization up to that point of almost perfection.

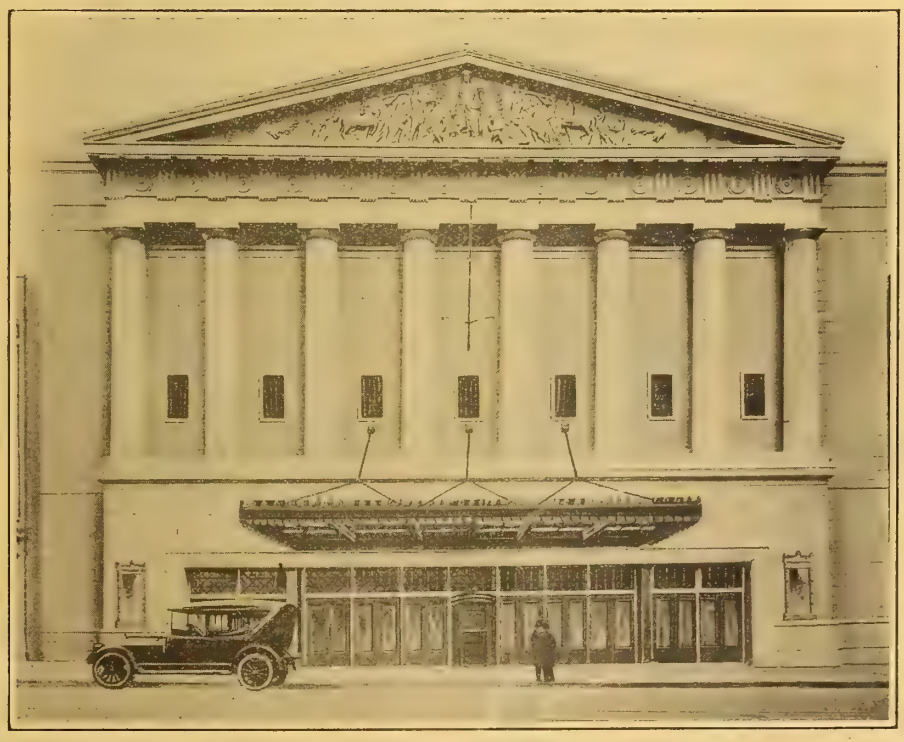
This Week at the Strand

MANAGING DIRECTOR HAROLD EDEL'S second selection for his tabloid opera at the Strand is "The Mikado," and this light opera being sung in English was even more appreciated by the audience than "Carmen," the initial effort. There were six singers, every one of whom got liberal applause. The Japanese setting reached across the entire stage this week, avoiding the crowded effect during the "Carmen" presentation.

There is a new setting this week for the overture, presenting a Greek building with water surrounding it and the hills in the background. The overture is "Espana," a rhapsody.

Special effects and most attractive music marked the presentation of the feature, Mae Marsh in "Field of Honor." With its many scenes from the war this afforded ample opportunity for special music and the battle effects which kept the audience stirred.

Unusually good music also marked the Strand Topical Review, which opens with a baby auto race and then shows a Paramount-Bray, "Art on the Typewriter," the clever work of a young Spaniard. One of these was a picture of Pershing and got a big hand as it was shown with "Yankee Doodle." Arabians enlisting against the Turks, the Bellevue Hospital unit, the War Council at Washington. Official war films which followed were the same as those at the Rialto, as were the American war aims, but with a different view of marching troops at the end, which got tremendous applause. The Topical closed with the American flag.



"Animals in Midsummer," a Ditmars-Educational, got a big hand and many laughs. "Yellowstone Park" was the scenic and Mutt and Jeff in "Cold Storage Cupid" furnished the comedy element.

The Picture is the Thing

"To my friends in the motion picture industry, I wish to say that the keystone of our programs will always be the screen. Some have attributed the popularity of the Rialto to the music, the lighting, the service, or the surroundings. We who are behind the scenes know that it is the picture which has made all those possible."—From the Rivoli program.

S. L. Rothapfel

will constitute the backbone of Mr. Rothapfel's program for 1918.

These pictures have made possible such theatres as the Rivoli and the Rialto.

These pictures have been practically the only regular supply of consistently superb productions featuring foremost stars in clean stories, that are nationally known or advertised.

These are the pictures that have attracted the better class of people to photoplays and enabled an exhibitor to count on the drawing power of an attraction.

These are the pictures that justified an investment of the magnitude necessary to erect what Mr. Rothapfel so aptly styles, a "Triumph of the Motion Picture."

The producers and the industry generally, owe much to Mr. S. L. Rothapfel, who does more than manage the Rivoli and the Rialto.

He more than any other one individual, developed the organization and the conception which has resulted in the present motion picture presentation.

Mr. Rothapfeld has selected these pictures simply because experience has taught him they have always been consistently the best.

Show the best pictures obtainable and you will have the best class of patrons and the largest number.

S. L. Rothapfel—An Appreciation

By R. E. Pritchard
Author of "Seeing the Rialto with Rothapfel"

ONE almost wonders what would have happened to the national sport had Samuel L. Rothapfel gone into professional baseball instead of into motion pictures. The other night the presence of a caller at the Rivoli, now a prominent man in the amusement field, but once a big league player, revealed the fact that the creator of the Rialto and of the Rivoli, when a member of the marines, had an offer to join one of the major teams. He considered it awhile.

And if he had gone into baseball, there isn't the slightest doubt today that he would now have been the manager of the most active, fighting winning baseball organization in the country. The answer is the "pep" that fills his whole system, the hunger for hard work, the streak in him that will never quit—the earnest determination to do the best and have the best—not at the expense of others, but because he has created it.

But he didn't go into baseball, and the industry is glad. Years ago when he first went to Minneapolis and took the management of the Alhambra theatre, in a city where motion pictures were in bad standing because of the sensational films that had been shown there, he had his ideas—ideas ahead of the times. And there he met Sarah Bernhardt, then on one of her tours of the country. To her he explained some of his plans; hardly that, his ideals. "Messieur," she said to him in her broken English, "you are truly an artist—a genius."

SAMUEL L. ROTHAPFEL

And this sums up the reason why Rothapfel is today recognized as the premier exhibitor of the world, because he is an artist and he never loses his ideal.

His name today is known wherever there is a motion picture machine. His history is as familiar to you as that of George Washington. And so there is no need for any biography, except to recall to you who believe that this man has always had the commanding opportunity to do things he wanted to do. The other day a man writing to the Rothapfel Information Bureau, said: "It's all right for you with your great theatre, your immense orchestra and all the money that you want to spend to go the limit." He probably imagined this man as one who simply has to wave his hand and have money create for him whatever he would have.

But what are the facts? Here was a man who started out in life as a member of the U. S. marine corps and who then became a life insurance solicitor. Then he drifted to Forest City, Pa., and there he started in the motion picture exhibition business in a room back of a saloon. You are all familiar with the odds that he fought against there, of the way that he walked miles through the snow to get his reels when the railroads were tied up and his competitors closed their doors, of the fact that he wasn't too proud to get down on his hands and knees to show his employees how to scrub the floors, of the way that he made this little theatre, with a patronage almost exclusively of miners who could not speak English one of the most successful in the country. At the start he did things, because he worked hard. Night and day he was on the job, with no thought of personal comfort, no thought of anything but the success of his presentation. And he is the same Rothapfel today in the midst of the greatest success that any exhibitor has ever achieved.

Then he went to Philadelphia looking for a job and there he became acquainted with Joe Dougherty, manager of Keith's theatres, and there he had his first opportunity. It was a case of going ahead from that time on until he seemed to overstep himself and get too far ahead of the times. After that he became connected with the Keith and Proctor circuit and installed the daylight pictures which he had invented.

After that he became connected with Herman Fair and installed pictures on the Orpheum circuit and finally went to the Alhambra, Milwaukee, brimful of new ideas, still almost years ahead of the times. There it was that he made the first big presentation in the history of the motion picture—"The Fall of Troy"—in two reels. But the way he put it on made it stand out. It was at that time that the General Film Company controlled the market, and the Saxe interest controlled the local output of the General Film. All that was left for Rothapfel was the independent product. But that only spurred Rothapfel on to new efforts—to convert his dreams into realities. He had an orchestra and a fountain on the stage and he added every little detail to raise the standard of the pictures. He brought pictures up from the slough, an almost despised institution, to the highest level, so high that the man himself was elected a member of the leading clubs. Then the next thing to solve was the question of films. Rothapfel has never waited for people to do things for him. He always does them for himself. So he jumped on a train and went to Indianapolis, got the General Film product that he wanted, hired an express messenger to take them back to Milwaukee and after that paid four messengers to be constantly getting the films to his theatre. He got the same films twenty-four hours ahead of Saxe. In a few weeks his despised house was being so crowded that it was necessary to call out the police reserves night after night to hold the crowds back.

From there he went to the Lyric, Minneapolis, where he faced awful odds. Another new 800-seat house had just been erected and was charging five and ten cents for five acts of vaudeville and five reels of pictures when Rothapfel undertook to buck the game with a ten and twenty cent admission. The theatre lost $17,000 before he had his great opportunity in the presentation of Sarah Bernhardt in "Queen Elizabeth." "You see," he said to me, "she came into my life again." There he installed an orchestra on the stage and presented the picture with special scenic and lighting effects. It was the first time that a really wonderful picture had been presented in a really great way. And in a moment the public saw the genius in the theatre that Sarah Bernhardt had divined while listening to his story of his ideals.

But his ideas were too advanced. He wanted to do bigger and greater things. The result was that he was left out of a job, but almost immediately there came a call from the Regent theatre, 110th street and Lenox avenue, New York. It was then losing money. But he put some of his big plans into effect. He employed the orchestra and arranged the music for the production. One of the first of the big ones, one that startled all New York was "The Fall of Pompeii." He was at a loss for the score for the great picture until he happened into Aeolian Hall and heard the New York Symphony Orchestra playing "Rienzi." To his artistic mind this came as the inspiration and in his rush back to the theatre he bumped into two taxis and actually fell off a street car, so engrossed was he in the application of the music to the picture. It was there that he first engaged Carl Edouarde as his musical director, the first time that a motion picture house had been so honored.

The rest of the story is familiar. He took the Strand when it opened. Next he toured the country addressing exhibitors and then astonished the world by taking the Knickerbocker, an established legitimate house and converting it into pictures, with something of the same sort of program that he is using now. Then the Rialto was built for him, and the world acknowledged that the limit had been reached—until the Rivoli opened.

Yet Rothapfel is not done. He has great dreams ahead—not merely dreams, but actual plans which promise to further startle the motion picture world, to place new laurel wreaths on the brow of genius.

I first met this man when he was on his tour of the country, telling exhibitors how he could improve conditions, how they could make the industry forge far ahead. It was in a large city and when he had finished the exhibitors present applauded mildly, but as they left the room there were sly winks to each other, and such comments as "He's a dreamer," and others more emphatic, as "He's a fool; it can't be done." This year he went to the same city to assist at the opening of a new theatre, a house that has tried to follow the ideals of the Rialto, and he was hailed by the same men as the unquestioned leader—almost as a hero. When he spoke for the second time in that city, it was not the voice of the prophet, but of the man who had done. The cheers that greeted him would have done honor to any man in the nation.

He was delighted, for he is a man who has never grown up in anything except his accomplishments. He is today the same boyish, genuine, enthusiastic youth of sixteen. He is ever earnest, fighting, struggling, and never satisfied. He always takes the burden on his own shoulders, and shifts the "well done" to others.

Probably one of the greatest reasons for the success of this man is his infectious enthusiasm. When you come to know him, to hear him talk, to see how he does things it seizes you, too. No wonder that the same spirit moves all of his employees—that he has one of the greatest organizations in the country. This was proved by the fact that he opened the Rivoli without employing the head of any new department. The men had been so well trained at the Rialto that there were men to step into their places when they moved to the newer theatre. There were men ready to take their places because of the superb organization, men who were inspired by the spirit that they had seen in their chief.

The other night we sat in the Rivoli and it was reported to Mr. Rothapfel that something had gone wrong. He had just arisen from bed after an illness of two days. He was under a strain. He summoned the chief of this department and demanded why this thing had not been fixed. He grew angry in his enthusiasm, he demanded that this man stay up until the erring piece of machinery had moved to satisfaction. And then his voice softened. They talked of other affairs, and the "Chief" left.

"I want the boy to make good," he said to me with a trace of sadness in his smile. "I have just promoted him to a position that many men much older would like to have. I want to make him think for himself. I would have stayed up all night to have seen that was in working order. I want to get my men thinking; I want them to get to doing things on their own account. I don't want them coming to me with excuses about why things went wrong; I want them to fix the thing and then come to me and tell that the fault has occurred, but that it has been cured."

Years ago it was hard for us to believe what our parents told us as they gave us a good licking—that "it hurts me more than it does you." But afterwards, when we had grown up to the bigger life we knew that it was true—we knew the regret that comes when we give an injury. And Rothapfel has that same feeling for everyone that works for him—he has the fatherhood of his people; it hurts him more than it does them when they fail to measure up to the situation.

For Rothapfel is human; he is more than that. Before I began writing the stories of "Seeing the Rialto with Rothapfel," a very good friend of mine who, I knew later, knew this man to a very small extent, told me that I would find this man very much "up stage." I went there the first Sunday expecting to have this man tell me how great he was, what wonders he had accomplished, how he led the world—as he does lead it. But we stood there in the balcony together and looked at the first showing of a new bill with his secretary by his side, giving orders of little mistakes, nervous in his anxiety that everything should go to the acme of perfection. Now and then we talked, but most of the time he was silent, spending his time criticizing himself.

And then after this first showing he asked me what I thought of it. It was wonderful and I said so.

There came the quick smile that makes his face so friendly. There was almost gratitude in his voice. Rothapfel loves praise when it is sincere. He knows and hates a sycophant.

I have seen this man more closely than probably anyone except a few of his employees. I have been with him when he was planning big things with his chiefs of staff. I knew many of the secrets of the Rivoli, before; in a later discussion he imparted some of them to his friend and publicity manager. I have seen his man when he was worn to the thread after three days without rest. I have been with him when he was stirred by some "terrible" break made by one of his employees (which the audience never noticed) and I have seen him on such a night as the opening of the Rivoli when a half hundred stars of the motion picture world were verbally worshipping at his feet in praise of the work that he had accomplished.

And he has always been the same—genuine, enthusiastic, boyish.

And this man will always be the same until the end of the chapter.

The other night the doorman who guards visitors from him came in, after Rothapfel had arisen from a sick bed, and expressed the wish that he go home and not break down.

"I am not going to break down," he replied. "I can't do it. I won't."

HE WON'T.

It's a great treat to see this man at work. Of course he has to leave a lot of the details to his lieutenants, but at the end he is the man who is responsible for the successes and the errors. Rothapfel may be a good stud poker player for all I know, but

What the Rialto Has Accomplished

RIALTO is the reason for the Rivoli.

When the splendid theatre at Broadway and Seventh avenue, occupying the site of Hammerstein's vaudeville house, was announced as the home of motion pictures there were all sorts of predictions of dire losses that would be the result. But those who scoffed did not count on the magic hand of Rothapfel.

In the first place, the construction of the house was entirely different from any other motion picture house, so arranged as to allow the greatest field for music and lighting. And from the very start new wonders began to happen in this house. There were the combination of music, instrumental and vocal, with the picture, such as were never imagined. But Rothapfel has always kept the picture the main thing.

Within a few weeks the Rialto came to be one of the most popular places in the city and long lines stood in front of the house all day Sunday and through the week-day evenings waiting for admission. The cry of "standing room only!" was always to be expected. It was natural, after the Rialto had built up such a following, that there should be some outlet for those who wanted to enjoy the handiwork of Rothapfel, and the Rivoli was the response.

Not only the musicians, the pictures and the lighting and the stage setting contributed to the success of the Rivoli, but it has been a fact that every detail has been given the attention of Mr. Rothapfel. There has been no more wonderful organization built up than that of the Rialto; in fact, so perfect was it that all the heads of the departments of the Rivoli were taken from the staff of the other house.

Courtesy and service have been two of the watchwords of the house. The picture of the ushers with the salute "At your service" has become familiar to everyone, and the pains that are taken in making each patron comfortable have made the theatre homelike to everyone. Mr. Rothapfel has really built up the Rialto as a place that the public loves, and once become a Rialto fan the habit is lasting.

Open bookings have been followed at the Rialto, as they will be at the Rivoli. Paramount and Artcraft have furnished a very generous share of attractions, including all the productions of such stars as Douglas Fairbanks, William S. Hart, Elsie Ferguson, Charles Ray, Julian Eltinge and others. First National Exhibitors' circuit had its first picture, Mme. Petrova in "A Daughter of Destiny," shown at the Rialto, and all of the productions of this circuit will be shown at one of the two houses.

Educational Film Company has contributed almost weekly to the program, especially with the Robert Bruce pictures, and with the music accompaniment that they have had they attract unusual attention. In fact, Mr. Rothapfel advertises these prominently.

With its magnificent orchestra of fifty pieces and its splendid organ the music has surpassed anything known in New York at popular prices. Leading soloists have appeared, together with choral effects, the Rialto quartet and various dancers. One of the charms of the Rialto is that the unexpected is always happening there. And another charm is that Rothapfel always finds the motif for his entire production, and the whole bill is in such complete harmony that there is but one feeling at the end of the performance—delight!

And so the Rialto has revolutionized.

SUGGESTIONS, SPECIFICATIONS AND ESTIMATES FURNISHED

1416 BROADWAY - - NEW YORK

Rivoli Fills Every Dream of Creator

WHEN the Rivoli theatre was promised to the motion picture public of New York as a house even finer than the Rialto there was doubt. The Rialto has gone so far in fulfilling every desire, in the perfection of pictures, in the combination of music and lighting and song that it was extremely difficult to imagine going a step further.

Yet such was the confidence in Mr. Rothapfel that on the nigth of the opening, though it was strictly an invitation affair, hundreds stood on the sidewalk hoping against hope that they would be able to get a ticket from some friend or purchase admission from a speculator. Is was an admission, after all, that they had faith in the creator of the house—"The Triumph of the Motion Picture."

This splendid house, with its 2,500 seats, could not be expected to supply any vast amount of novelties beyond the Rialto, yet it does afford great facilities for the presentation of the picture and the music, both vocal and instrumental, greater comfort of the patrons, if that were possible, and even greater luxuriousness. It is a theatre that grows on the visitor—a house so vast that one has to become familiar with the various details to realize to what extent the construction progress has gone.

Many Novel Features

From an architectural point of view, the Rivoli offers a number of novel features which will be of interest to theatre builders and to the playgoing public in general. Certainly nothing in the way of architecture has ever called forth more admiring comments from the crowds along Broadway than the classic façade which fronts on that restless thoroughfare. Viewed from that site, it suggests an art museum or public library rather than a theatre, and unquestionably it already has taken rank as the handsomest theatrical edifice in the city.

The façade is constructed of an extremely light colored stone, so light that when illuminated at night by the indirect lighting system it will have the effect of white marble. There are no electric signs on the building above those used on the marquee to announce current attractions. Searchlights and arcs are disposed in such a way as to throw the severe outlines of the building into bold relief and render it the most conspicuous structure within many blocks on nights lights are allowed.

The most striking feature of the façade is its row of eight towering Doric columns. These extend from a point above the level of the marquee clear up to the entablature, with nothing to relieve their severity save the leaded glass windows set into the wall behind them. Crowning the entire façade is the broad triangular pediment, adorned with sculptured figures in deep bas-relief, which suggest those of the world-famed Parthenon at Athens. These figures are symbolical of music and the arts in general, as befits the nature of the entertainment offered.

There is an Egyptian note to the slanting lines which frame the main entrance to the theatre, but otherwise the scheme is pure Grecian. Credit for the architecture of the building goes to Thomas W. Lamb.

Coming to the interior construction of the Rivoli, the most novel and interesting feature is found in the elaborate precautions which have been taken to insure the expeditious handling of large crowds. Taking advantages of the fact that the building extends through the block from Broadway to Seventh avenue, the architect designed a series of superimposed passageways of generous width which parallel the auditorium on both sides and run straight through the structure from front to rear. Not only are the orchestra and mezzanine floors cared for in this manner, but each cross-aisle of the balcony has its own corridor as well, so that patrons in any part of the house will find themselves but a few steps from a doorway at which they can turn either to right or to left and pass directly to the street most convenient to them, without interference from incoming crowds.

This system of entrances and exits bears a marked resemblance

The Rivoli Operating Room

THE operating room has been termed the "heart" of a motion picture theatre, and one will naturally be led to expect that the operating room of the Rivoli theatre represents the acme of practical design and equipment. The limits of space prevent a miscroscopic description of the operating room in Mr. Rothapfel's new theatre, but the following outline of its equipment, as constructed and installed according to the specifications of Lester Bowen, the chief operator, will doubtless prove of interest.

The projecting machines which grace the operating room of this well-appointed theatre are two Type S Simplexes, enameled a battleship gray and have highly polished nickel trimmings, as the photo shows. They are also provided with many refinements which cannot be detailed here, although mention may be made of the fact that both projectors are equipped with the Robin Cinema Time and Speed Indicator, a device which tells with wondrous accuracy the rate of projection in pictures per minute and feet per minute. In addition to these beautiful projectors, two special combined stereopticon machines, made to order by the Precision Machine Company, are also employed. Each of these special stereopticon machines is equipped with two arc lights, a triple condenser system, adjustable for lenses of various focal lengths; iris diaphragms and gear drives for making rapid adjustments. These machines can be used for slide projection, or as spotlights of any color, and the beams from the two lenses can be made to converge if a stronger spot is required. The stereopticon machines are finished the same as the Simplex projectors and present an appearance unequaled in any other operating room in the world.

Rivoli Operating Room

The projected picture is approximately 18 feet wide, being received on a Minusa Gold Fibre screen, specially built to the requirements of the Rivoli theatre. The projection is at an angle of 19 degrees and the screen is tilted 18 inches outward at the bottom to correct distortion. Credit for the installation of the Simplex machines, special stereopticon machines, the speed indicators and the Minusa screen is due to B. F. Porter, the Simplex man, of 1482 Broadway.

Returning again to the operating room, it is apparent from the photo that no expense has been spared in the installing devices which facilitate perfect projection. The electrical wiring was carried out by the Edwards Electrical Construction Company and the massive switch-board is probably the most expensive and flexible electrical system ever put in an operating room. There are two services connected to this board, these being alternating current from the United Electric Light and Power Company and direct current from the New York Edison Company. Direct current is normally used, but in the case of an interruption in service the alternating current would be used after being changed to D.C. by the large 10 K.W. Martin Rotary Converter installed. The Martin Rotary is a 15 H.P. machine which can deliver 140 amperes.

The installation consists of three large rheostat units, each one capable of delivering anywhere from 50 to 120 amperes to each one of three projectors. The rheostats are of the wire coil multiple unit type with terminals at the bottom for each individual unit. These terminals are connected by means of heavy cables to three special Hallberg Control panels made of Blue Vermont Marble upon each of which there is mounted one ampere meter reading from zero to 150, one volt meter reading from zero to 150, a speed indicator for indicating the speed at which the film is being moved through the projector and a control handle for a dial switch mounted in a box back of each panel. The purpose of this switch is to include a greater or smaller number of multiple unit resistances in the rheostats referred to in series with the arc.

By turning the control handle of the dial switch to the right a range of 50 to 120 amperes of current is available, while by turning the control hand to left the full range from 10 to 120 amperes is at the command of the operator.

This arrangement permits the operator to instantly change the amperage at the arc in approximately ten amperee divisions without moving from his post because the instrument and control panels are placed immediately in front of the operator at the right of the porthole. The entire control panel is hinged to a metal box, which is set in the wall. On the back of the box the dial switch is mounted, and the heavy leads running from the rheostats which are located near the ceiling connect to this dial switch, and the construction of each is very unique and original.

The shunt for the ampere meter is also placed in the box back of the panel, therefore all instruments on the panel are supplied with current through small flexible leads, making it unnecessary to attach any of the heavy cables to the connections on the marble panel. This is quite a convenience if it ever becomes necessary to readjust or repair the contacts on the large dial control switches. The handle for the switch is part of the panel which swings on hinges, making a very practical and satisfactory arrangement.

There are also four similar panels, but slightly smaller with dial switches connected to four rheostats of the same type adjustable up to 70 amperes each for the control of the four projector arcs for use with special combination dissolving stereopticon and spot lights.

The arcs of the Simplex projecting machines are automatically fed by two Speedco Arc Controllers, enameled battleship gray to match the rest of the equipment, and mounted on pedestals as shown.

In the rewinding room is an automatic aluminum-inclosed rewinder, which is motor-driven and accommodates 15-inch reels carrying 2,000 feet of film. A feature of these rewinders is that should a break occur when rewinding, the device automatically stops. The Speedco Arc Controllers, automatic rewinder and numerous other operating-room accessories were supplied by the Independent Movie Supply Co., of 729 Seventh avenue, New York.

Rivoli Makes Good

to the one used in emptying the Colosseum at Rome of its eighty thousand occupants during the days of the gladiators, a process which historians say could be accomplished in from fifteen to twenty minutes.

It quite does away with the possibility of congestion even under the most trying of imaginable circumstances. In the event of a panic occurring with the house filled to capacity, the crowds would find so many exists at hand, leading into corridors so spacious and free from twists that the builders consider the escape of the entire audience as a matter to be reckoned in seconds rather than minutes.

The whole structure is built with similar ideas of spaciousness. The lobby will hold three hundred people comfortably and the foyer is wide enough to give easy access to the orchestra seats.

Entrances to the theatre are novel in that they are from the two ends of the lobby. Thus the patrons have a direct way to get in without interfering with the outcoming people. There are two steps for those going to the orchestra floor, but the stairways to the mezzanine floor and thence to the upper portion of the balcony lead immediately away from the entrance, so that there is no excuse for searching about looking for the place to go, the doorman immediately directing the patron to the portion of the house his ticket calls for.

Additional Lighting Effects

Attracting one's attention immediately is a well-like effect from the mezzanine floor just above the rear seats. This oval opening gives an opportunity for much more of the lighting effects than are afforded at the Rialto, for in the latter theatre it is impossible for those seated under the balcony to get the full effect of the changing colors. Under the system followed at the Rivoli the whole of the house is bathed in the various colors.

This method of handling color through a system of indirect lighting permits of effects in the Rivoli which are beyond the imagining of those who have not seen them. At the Rialto Mr. Rothapfel first essayed this particular form of wizardry, with results that were amazing, to say the least, but the lighting plant there was in a measure experimental. It was installed in a theatre which was rebuilt as a motion picture house before the artistic value of Mr. Rothapfel's ideas on lighting had been demonstrated. Profiting by the popularity of the "color symphonies," for which the Rialto has become famous, the builders of the Rivoli took into consideration that feature from the outset, with the result that the place is equipped from floor to dome with all the wiring, the masked lamps, and other ingeniously concealed sources of light requisite to flood the auditorium with any color or combination of color desired. If the orchestra is playing the "Moonlight Sonata," the entire audience can seemingly be bathed in moonlight without being directly aware of where the light is coming from. The possibilities in this respect are quite limitless and no doubt will at times prove most bewildering.

The central dome is somewhat on the order of that at the Rialto, but even more beautiful and with still stronger lighting possibilities. The proscenium arch itself afford still greater chance for effects, while at either side of the stage are glass window effects through which the lighting scheme can be still further carried out. Even the columns near the stage are subjected to this treatment, with the result that almost any result desired can be achieved.

Elaborate Perfume System

Another and in this case an entirely novel feature of the Rivoli is the introduction of perfume to supplement the appeal made to the other senses. Several thousand dollars have been expended on a newly devised compressor plant which operates in connection with an intricate system of atomizers and by means of which any delicate odor desired can be wafted instantly to all parts of the house; incense for Oriental scenes, clover and new mown hay when the stage setting reveals a country landscape at dusk, a myriad variety of floral scents if a garden scene is to be suggested, and any other blending of odors so long as they be aesthetically possible and have a definite suggestive value. It is a familiar psychological fact that odors are among the most powerful known stimulants of memory. Mr. Rothapfel counts upon his perfumes to awaken an association of ideas in the minds of his patrons for which the effect of his music and his pictures will be heightened to such an extent that for the moment the audience will forget its material surroundings and be borne away into the land of illusion which is spread before it. Tentative experiments along these lines at the Rialto have met with quite sufficient success to warrant the construction of the perfume distribution plant in the new theatre.

In the way of stage setting and scenic effects, Rothapfel has far greater scope for his ingenuity than he has had heretofore. For the opening of the theatre the stage setting will be known as "The Conservatory of Jewels," a masterful creation which made even blasé Broadway open its eyes. It consists of a dome within a dome, each studded with huge crystal gems after the manner of the celebrated Tower of Jewels at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. These flash with kaleidoscopic effect when the light plays upon them from in front and glow softly in their several colors when another set of lights is brought into play behind them. The base of the inner dome is encrusted with a fine jeweled mosaic.

The brightest jewel of all, of course, is the screen, and this is arranged so that it fits in as a component part of the stage picture. There are two sets of curtains, a screen curtain and a tableau curtain, thus adding another innovation to houses of this character.

General Interior Decorations

The general interior decoration scheme is Italian Renaissance, with the dominant colors dull gold, ivory and black. The carpets are in grey and the seats upholstered in black. The seats on the orchestra floor and in the balcony are exceptionally wide and comfortable, while in the loges there are regular arm chairs, which are so comfortable that with a less entertaining bill than that afforded by the Rivoli one would be tempted to fall asleep.

While one full appreciates the magnificence of the house from the orchestra floor, one needs to go to the first and second mezzanine floor to get the full effect. On the first mezzanine are retiring rooms, telephones, etc., with ample space all around the well for persons to rest during the performance. This is artistically decorated with palm effects. From either side of this there are sloping ways leading to the seats on the first mezzanine floor and the loges.

On the third mezzanine floor are the excutive offices and similar entrance ways to the upper portion of the balcony, which is railed off from the lower, so as to prevent confusion of patrons. The aisles are especially wide and there is no excuse for any person of normal physique to be uncomfortable.

Of course one of the big features of the Rivoli is the even greater opportunity for music. In addition to the greatest pipe organ ever installed in any theatre, one that will give every known musical effect, there is a symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Hugo Reisenfeld. On special occasions this will be combined with the fifty from the Rialto orchestra and the Rivoli will be the scene of special concerts. An attractive project to be noted in the orchestra arrangement are the music stands which were supplied by Kliegel Brothers and which are designed with especial reference to the artistic effect.

the Edwards Electrical Construction Company, which also installed these devices in the Rialto. The vast experience of the company was put to considerable test to install so large an equipment on such short notice, for this was the biggest contract of the sort ever awarded, but the whole work was carried out in record time.

The installation itself consists of a specially designed double switchboard having eighty-three switches with a double bank of dimmers consisting of eighty-three plates. The switchboard is the latest type dead-front interlocking style, and is arranged so that any number of switches can be operated with a throw of one single handle. The dimmers are arranged in the same manner as the switchboard.

The stage is equipped with footlights, borders and strips, all four-color, employing over 3,000 lamps to get the various color effects. Novel effects are created by concealed lighting for the stage dome, and also lighting behind pilasters, friezes, lattice, etc., so that light can be thrown either on an object or through it, thereby obtaining a great many beautiful effects hitherto unthought of. The stage equipment is particularly heavy in that all of the stage pockets are four-color, and all are on dimmers.

The house is wired up in three-color circuits, so that the coves and outlets on the ceiling can be manipulated to give various color combinations, such as have been so successfully used by Mr. Rothapfel.

The interior decorating was done by William Eckart of the William Eckart studios, who had done the same work at the Rialto. Mr. Eckart is looked upon as the father of theatre decoration in this country and he is called upon to design and execute the decorations for the leading theatres all over the country. The decorations of the Rivoli, while not gaudy achieve a most artistic effect. Everywhere the eye is delighted by the splendid harmonies. Voltaflat, a sanitary paint, made from non-poisonous pigments, is used in the interior decorations. This was selected because of its decorative finish and sanitary value.

But while one is considering the decorative features, attention is called to the front of the house where, unquestionably, the most artistic announcements that have ever appeared before any motion picture house appear. The lobby frames, both inside and out and all of the mirrors, were furnished by S. Markendorff, of 122 West Twenty-third street, and these attract unusual attention because of their artistic character. They in themselves promise that inside the thatre everyone will find all that could be sought in the way of dignified luxury.

Wonderful Display Effects

These poster effects are really handpainting, furnished by C. H. Dryden and Co., of 1664 Broadway. These are changed with each performance and there are no two of the posters duplicated. So far those that have appeared have been on Douglas Fairbanks, in "A Modern Musketeer," and Elsie Ferguson, in "Rose of the World." They include beautiful pictures of the star in the costumes that they wear and a number of different scenes from the picture. These are made after the picture itself has been studied so that the perfect effect has been obtained, while the wonderful coloring gives them additional delight. This work really marks a new era in theatrical display for high-class houses and other theatres will do mighty well to follow the example set by the Rivoli.

In the lobbies, as well as in the interior, all of the great quantity of brass rails were furnished by the U. T. Hungerford Brass and Copper Company. Each part of the house is railed off from the rest so as to prevent confusion. These are of special design and are one of the most attractive features of the theatre.

Of course, the Rivoli is heated, cooled and ventilated by the Typhoon system, the plant being designed and installed by J. F. Dailey, C. E. In hot weather the theatre will be cooled by four mammoth fans, each eight feet in diameter, and two six-foot Typhoons, all located on the roof at the screen end of the theatre. For heating these six-foot fans draw fresh air through steam-heated coils, thus warming it to the desired temperature and then distributing it evenly through the house. The temperature is even through the theatre and back-draughts cannot enter when the doors are opened, for the reason that warm air forces it back.

The "hub" of the Rivoli is, of course, the box office and there the equipment of the Automatic Ticket Seller and Cash Register Co. is installed. There are two ticket windows at the Rivoli box office and each window is equipped with one of these machines of four units—that is, one that sells four different-priced tickets. A simple touch of the finger is sufficient to make a strip of tickets from one to five appear in an instant and therefore speed the patron along.

certainly he knows nothing about "passing the buck."

He likes to talk to people with ideas. The man who simply comes to praise him will soon be most politely dismissed. The man with ideas, who interests him will be begged to stay. I have heard him say that he was literally worn out and that he had to go home to get some sleep, and in the next breath, when his visitor started to leave, he urged him to stay longer.

Rothapfel likes for people to criticize him; but he wants to know specifically what is the matter. He doesn't want generalities of praise or generalities of fault finding.

Once during the temporary illness of Dr. Hugo Reisenfeld, musical director of both houses, Rothapfel led the orchestra for a whole week—he often leads it for a day at a time. That Sunday evening, as we sat in his office at the Rialto, one of the chief musicians came in and the manager wanted to know what was the matter with the renditions. The musician told him. "I knew that something was wrong there," said Mr. Rothapfel. "Tell them to get that new spirit at the point where they have been lagging."

This man cannot read a line of music, but he is one of the world's greatest musicians—he has it written in his soul. When you talk to him, he half hums the bars as he talks; he speaks and lives and thinks in music. It is not to him a thing written merely to get a technical effect; it is a soul of expression.

It is wonderfully interesting to watch this man while the score is being arranged for some feature, for the Animated Magazine, a comedy or a scenic. The picture itself always quickly suggests something to him, some air that is dug out of his vast storehouse and which generally fits the picture. It is not the music that makes the Rialto and the Rivoli the successes they are but the perfect coordination of the music with the picture.

Just another little thought in these more or less hazy sidelights. On the night of the opening of the Rivoli everything did not go just right. In the first place the theatre was not ready for opening, and, as Mr. Rothapfel expressed it, the staff was so confident that they insisted on opening the house on their nerves. I sat near the front of the orchestra floor and with the exception that the first number was too long everything seemed to move with an amazing success.

I did not know that while the audience was wildly applauding one of the numbers that Rothapfel himself, in his shirt sleeves, was busy making a correction in the screen, that he got it ready barely in time to show the feature. But that is Rothapfel. He is ever ready to take off his coat and go to work. And there were many other things to discourage him.

When the presentation was over, I and hundreds of others found him in his office on the third floor. There was a deluge of congratulations. Everyone told him what a wonderful performance it was. His eyes brightened. "It was a flivver, at this and that place," he said, far harder on himself than his worst enemy would have been. And he himself pointed out what was wrong .

But still the enthusiasm of the congratulations seized him and the hypnotic smile came to his face. "I am tired," he said. "Let's all go over to Churchill's and rest from it." And in his wake came star after star whose prayer has been that their picture might be shown in his house, and star after star whose pictures now and then have been shown there and who have seen the master hand in the way their pictures were presented.

But praise does not spoil him. He is ever the genuine man that he is. He can cast aside the false with the ease of an umbrella shedding the rain. He loves the genuine; he rejoices in the living, in the glories of life and achievement.

Sarah Bernhardt said that he was a genius. He is a genius, a human, lovable genius.

Rivoli, with Record Receipts, Proves Public Will Support Best in Picture Theatres

IT has tbeen the history of all theatres, of all classes, that one must establish itself before it wins popularity. It may be a success at the start, but it is not the full grown success that it will be later. This was true of the Rialto, the first house that S. L. Rothapfel had built especially for him. The house made money from the start, but it achieved only a small portion of the success that it has now. It's atmosphere hadn't won a clientele that would come week after week to enjoy the Rialto way of doing things.

But the Rivoli! Opening during a spell of weather when the temperature was well below zero for days, and New York was paralyzed by the coal shortage and with admission only by invitation on the opening night, it is no secret to reveal that this house has broken all records for pictures shown at anything like popular prices. The writer left the theatre on Thursday evening after 9:30, just the last day of the second week of the operation of the house, and at that time every seat was taken, the lobby was packed and crowds were still waiting outside to buy tickets.

And so with the success of the Rivoli, what of the Rialto? It has not suffered the slightest from the amazing leap of Rothapfel's new house. With its splendid show, described in last week's issue, the theatre continued to be crowded at every performance. It proved that the public is eager for theatres of this type, and that the opening of another one does not injure those that are already established. The only amazing thing is that so many thousands should take the Rivoli to their hearts barely had the doors opened. The answer is—Rothapfel.

In the second bill he has introduced the chorus with remarkable effect that has truly united music, vocal and instrumental with the picture. After a splendid rendition of "The Dance of the Hours" during which the lighting effects perfectly carried out the scheme of the hours of dawn, the hours of day, the hours of evening and the hours of night came the Rivoli Animated. It opened with "Picturesque Bits of Canada," shown to "The Festival March," and then came the ice-bound New York harbor, while "Rustles of Spring" was played agitato. Urchins swiping coal were shown with "Come Across," a whistling melody, and then followed Mayor Hylan's arrival at City Hall with the same tune. Get the humorous little touch? "Taming Wild Birds," the first of the William L. Finley nature pictures was a remarkable study and "Whispering Flowers" was the music for it. "Italian Vespers" was played with the Allies sending supplies to the Italians, and was continued through pictures of Italian soldiers at the front on skiis. Arrival of the Liberty army trucks was accompanied by "Keep the Home Fires Burning," which continued to the end of the Animated which came with Mme. Schumann-Heink presenting a flag to the sailors at San Diego.

Auberto Bachman, concert master, followed with Vieuxtemps' "Air Varie," and then some Kalem pictures of "The Holy Land" were shown for the first time. They were used with a purpose, not only because they were exclusive and brought a big hand, but because they led to the first of the two big chorusses, "Thy Love Is Mine" from "The Queen of Sheba," sung by Gladys Rice and a chorus of fourteen. For this scene the background became a scene in the Holy Land, the dull red lighting adding a weird effect, while here the Rivoli showed some of its other lighting possibilities by making part of the chorus stand out in red and others in white.

"To a Wild Rose" was the motif for the feature. Elsie Ferguson in "Rose of the World," a most unusual picture. Effects were used to excellent advantage during the battle scene, not only with the firing of the guns, but with the vivid flashing lights that seemed to carry the battle into the very auditorium. There was another strong effect obtained during the incantation scene, by introducing the chorussed voices into the strange, musical cries of the mystic beyond. It had an uncanny, but roving power.

Now watch the connection of music and picture. First the Holy Land picture was followed by the "Queen of Sheba" song and setting and then the same spirit of the strange land was followed in the feature, most of the scenes of which are laid in India, also a mystic land. But it is largely a story of fighting men, and what should be more fitting than that this should be followed by the big Rivoli male chorus, in costume singing "The Soldiers' Chorus" from "Faust." Whether every one saw the idea or not, the effect on the audience was magical and the words, "We lay aside our arms for we are at home from war—glory to the men of old" swept to the hearts of everyone.

Then after these four numbers without a possibility of a laugh, came the Rothapfel trick of sending the audience away whistling and merry, for he showed the Metro-Drew comedy "Our Mutual Motor" played with "My Merry Old Automobile."

And as the crowds thronged out to go home there were still waiting hundreds jamming the lobbies to get in.

Shea's Hippodrome Puts Much Emphasis on Orchestra

SINCE this department has been started we have been telling you week after week about the importance of music in your theatre. Especially is this being driven home by the answers of S. L. Rothapfel to the exhibitors' questions.

There isn't the slightest doubt that there has been greater growth in the interest of music in the theatre than ever before in the history of the motion picture. All over the country the bigger theatres are putting in orchestras, and many of the smaller houses are making progress along the same line.

One of the houses which pays great attention to the music is Shea's Hippodrome, Buffalo. This house, under the able management of Harold B. Franklin, furnishes many of the best ideas in showmanship, and frequent accounts of what Mr. Franklin is doing have been printed here. The accompanying picture shows the Hippodrome orchestra, which is supplemented by a massive organ.

Every picture, before it is shown at this house, is screened by the musical director, Mr. Moulton, and the music for the picture is carefully selected and rehearsed. The overtures are especially selected.

Your Idea---and Ours

PLAZA THEATRE, San Diego, Cal., carried an interesting advertisement in the local papers Christmas morning. This was paid for by the owner of the theatre and paid tribute to the work of the employes, some of them my name. In the

A Little Talk About Mr. Quinn and Others---A Christmas Acknowledgement

On this Christmas day the owner of the Plaza Theatre desires to make public acknowledgement of the helpfulness and loyalty of the employes of the Plaza, who have contributed--and who do contribute daily--to the wonderful success our Theatre is having. Greater "team work," more loyal service, both to the Theatre and to the public, or happier or better satisfied employes, it would not be reasonable to expect, in any business at any time.

Mr. Quinn--his friends call him "Chris" for short--is the House Manager. The record does not disclose that he was born in a theatre, but practically all of his life has been spent in the theatre business--and he is efficient. Born in Canada, reared in the United States--a musician of high order, a scholar, and a gentleman. Some of the real pleasure in owning the Plaza Theatre, is the opportunity it affords to have Mr. Quinn for employe, associate and friend. Mr. Quinn has three brothers, all connected in some way with theatres. We believe your visit to our Theatre will be even more enjoyable if you know our staff. Meet Mr. Quinn.

Mr. Russel Rogers is assistant to the Manager, and a young man of excellent attainments, the son of a man long connected with some of the greatest financial interests in America; of whom any father would be proud. Mr. Rogers is usually "on the door" during the busy hours. These two busy men, after working from ten in the morning until about midnight---and cheerful and happy every moment---haven't much else to do---until the next day.

And the ladies who help us, with our music, and in the box-office, on fair days and stormy days and evenings—always sincere, painstaking, attentive, and alert--we are grateful for and appreciative of their excellent service.

The "man in the box" you may not see., Mr. E. H. Dowell, master electrician, with his help, is the operator who projects the picture. We know of none better. Then there are others, several others, whom we will not mention by name, but all of whom by their cheerful, willing and skillful efforts, go to make up the Plaza's business family, and help us to deserve the excellent patronage we are receiving, for which

We again thank you.

Plaza Theatre

P. S. It is needless to state that no one connected with the Theatre except the writer had knowledge of this acknowledgement until its publication.

first place, we'll wager that this was read by everyone of the regular patrons of the theatre and a lot of others were attracted by the unusual character of the advertisement and that it caused these people that never or rarely went to the theatre to think.

And of course the thought that came to those, as well as to the regular patrons was that the Plaza must be a little superior to the other houses; at least it must start an unconscious comparison in the reader's mind. This display also typifies service without specifically mentioning it. This is a good Christmas tribute that is bound to bring the public a little closer to your house.

Lightless nights do not call for you to turn the current off your enterprise plant.

SELECT PICTURES has adopted a unique form for its little folders advertising each picture and which are sent to the exhibitors for use among the patrons. There are in the form of the reproduction of the cover of a book, space being left on the back for the advertising of the exhibitor, while inside there are scenes from the production and a short story about the picture, together with the cast.

It is always worth while to get your folder matter distinctive and this product of Select is likely to attract attention. The great trouble with the ordinary folder, especially when sent may mail, that the moment the possible patron opens the envelope and sees that it is merely the usual advertising matter he throws it away without reading it. It is really necessary to achieve some stunt that will make him "look inside" and we believe that Select has done that.

The ideal state for your patron to leave your theatre is feeling that he owes you something; you cannot afford to have him feel that he has failed to get value received.

GARFIELD theatre took advantage of the holiday season in a clever way, which not only resulted in a big audience on the day in question, but which undoubtedly went far in popularizing the house.

A couple of days after Christmas children are probably recovering from their holiday delights and are seeking amusement, and the chances are that their parents are still feeling in the frame of mind that they are glad to get the little ones away from home for a short time. So the Garfield took advantage of conditions and put on a special matinee at a price which probably did not more than pay expenses, but which certainly made for future patronage. Reports are that the attendance of adults was also large.

There's just one little line in this announcement that attracts attention and that is the reference to "No school Thursday."

Of course every child very well knew that there was no school that day, but the announcement left the impression with the parents and with the children themselves that the Garfield theatre was interested enough in the happiness of the youth to arrange a special program on a day when it would not interfere with their studies. had followed the arrangement and then had cut about two thirds of the reading matter he would. He used a space only 6½ inches deep by two columns wide and the amount of reading matter that he used required the employment of regular news style type, far too small. The manager should have started out as he did with his name plate, and hours of performance and should have followed this with only the statement "No Other Picture Shown." That would have had much more appeal than the old "come early" idea. The rest of the advertisement is good down to the words "maidenhood of America." And there he should have stopped. The name of the picture should have been in larger type, Rex Beach should have been featured more and the line, "Portraying life itself not a simulation of it" should have been brought out stronger. It's a strong temptation to use every bit of your space possible. Don't do it; use just as little reading matter as you can.

Get the public's eye—but don't attempt to strain it.

IN its display on "The Cold Deck" the Alhambra theatre, Indianapolis, has achieved one of the best displays that we have seen in a long time. In this the Alhambra adheres to every rule that we have laid down in the talks on advertising. Simplicity, brief descriptive matter which does not undertake to tell all that the picture is about, adequate illustration, ample white space around the margins and the proper representations of the other portions of the program. The theatre has used a somewhat familiar cut of Wm. S. Hart with the two guns in his hand and beneath that the ace of diamonds, with a clever catch line, "An Ace in the Hole," and then just a few lines to tell the character of the picture. Note how the white space makes the picture stand out and how the whole thing hits you right in the face.

Remember the old game of "Heavy, heavy hangs over your head," and how you guessed what it was? Consider the same conditions in your own business, but don't guess—KNOW.

KING BEE comedies are offering to exhibitors a waltz written by the comedian. These are sent complete to the exhibitor for distribution and he can make any use of them he desires. In the first place it is suggested that here is a good permanent advertisement for these comedies, for the music will be kept around the house while ordinary advertising matter will survive but a few days at the most.

King Bee is also suggesting to the exhibitors that the way is open to have local patrons vie in writing words for this music and that unusual interest could be aroused at special performances by having these local compositions sung from the stage and let the audience judge. However exhibitors using these ideas should submit their plans for any contest to the local postal authorities so that it will agree with governmental regulations. Otherwise printed matter carrying the announcements will not be allowed to go through the mails.

You haven't done your duty when you sell the patron a ticket; you haven't done it until he leaves the theatre SATISFIED.

ALCAZAR theatre, Birmingham, has adopted the idea that has obtained in a few other cities of taking a page in the Sunday newspapers and devoting a considerable portion of the space to reading matter about current and future attractions at that house. Manager Charles W. Crewnshaw reports that this plan has been especially successful. We realize that conditions are different in various localities, and we do not believe that most newspapers in the larger cities would permit this plan to be used unless it was made plain that the entire page was an advertisement. Under the Birmingham principle the Alcazar pays a certain amount for the page and edits the copy that goes on it. It is a question in our mind whether, in most communities the greater part of the patrons will realize all of this pure advertising. We believe that it would be a great deal better if your newspapers gave reasonable showing to motion picture news and gave you prominence in relation to the amount of advertising that you do. But we note with regret that several of the papers in the south, including one that was a leader in the field, have retrograded in the matter of motion picture pages.

HOUSE PROGRAMS

Let Us See What You Are Doing and Hints to Others

WE are shortly to begin a series of articles about motion pictures house programs. We would be very glad to have specimens regularly from all of the theatres which are issuing these, in order that the best of them may be reproduced for the aid of others who are not so fortunate.

Next to newspaper advertising the program is probably the most important exploitation vehicle of the motion picture house, yet there is any amount of money wasted on these because of carelessness with which they are prepared or the failure to realize the essentials that are to be featured.

Address the copies to Exhibitors' Service Bureau, Motion Picture News.

How I Got the Advance Interest

This is the second of our series of articles, "The Diary of a Successful Exhibitor," by a successful exhibitor who will tell week after week what he has done to develop his house, the lessons that he has learned and the errors that he has discovered. It will be a frank discussion of the pleasures and evils of exhibition in a town of 15,000, and the tips contained here will probably be of value to managers in all sections.

By a Successful Exhibitor

AS soon as I had visited a couple of exchanges I found that I would be able to get my pick of the pictures, but the various managers were somewhat skeptical of my success. They all agreed with me that their particular pictures were so good that they ought to have much more than a single day's run in my town, but at the same time they raised the price on me for each of the two days above what I believed that my soon-to-be competitors were paying. I had studied some of the difficulties that my competitors had been having, and I came back with a statement on my own behalf which did not seem to impress them much.

It was this: I told these exchange men that I meant to exploit my pictures and get the fullest benefit of my territory, but that I must get my film on time and that there must be no substitution. In one or two cases I was told about the trouble with late trains and all that sort of thing, but I replied that before I would substitute a picture I meant to let the house go dark for the two days on which it was booked and stand the chances of explaining it to my patrons. Some of them looked on me tolerantly as a young man who was very full of enthusiasm at the start, but who would get over it in the end.

Two of the whole number of exchange men with whom I talked offered me any real advice on how I could show their pictures to better advantage. A fair share of the others talked "bunk," and I knew it. And let me observe here that if some of the producing companies knew how much some of their exchange managers relied on this selfsame bunk, on getting the new business and not worrying about keeping that business, there would be very likely to be a number of changes in some of these companies. I don't believe that most of these men realized the position that they were taking, but they appeared to have been so long trained in the atmosphere of the old-time days that they could not get away from it.

I succeeded in getting the pictures that I thought I wanted and then proceeded to arrange the details. I arranged to buy a set of photographs for each production that I would show, although a few of the managers urged that I rent these and then send them along to the next exhibitor on the booking list. I replied that I wanted to do my own work and that I wanted to have the material to work with even if it did cost a little more. I arranged in addition for stock cuts of the various stars, scene from productions and the like. As a matter of fact, I bought a good deal of stuff that I did not use, but I was to learn my mistakes only by experience.

All of this was concluded three weeks before my opening. I went home determined to spend my whole time in deciding how to make my public want to come to my theatre even before it was ready for patronage. It was just at that time that I received my copy of the Motion Picture News and read of the opening of a big New York theatre and then discovered that the admission on the first night was only by invitation. I also noted that the article said that all sorts of prices were being offered for invitations by speculators and there were hundreds before the doors that could not get in. I determined that if this were a good thing for New York it would be a good thing for my town.

First I had the local artist paint a huge banner which would almost cover the front of the house. This announced the opening of the theatre for Tuesday, but stated that the admission would be by invitation only and that the first paid admission day would be Wednesday when the opening bill would be repeated. Then I went to the local printer and had him prepare me invitations, with a blank left for the name. Now, my house would seat only about 500 people, and I had arranged for one performance in the afternoon and two in the evening, and so I also left the hours blank in these invitations. That was a little thing that occurred to me at the last moment. I purposely invited more than I could seat, because I wanted people to be turned away, but I did not want to disappoint those who came from a distance—the automobile patronage and the possible excursionists. So I carefully arranged that these people should be invited to the afternoon performance, reserving the two night shows for the town people.

I sent invitations to the more prominent people of the city, and this immediately started talk. By this time I had become well known in my home town again, and after the sign had made its appearance and the invitations had gone out I was constantly buttonholed by acquaintances who wanted to know why they didn't get invitations and how they could get in. I was very careful to see that every person who showed such interest in my enterprise got an invitation by the first mail.

A digression: While I had no training in the newspaper business, I had been associated with a firm in the big city that was a great believer in publicity. One of my chums was employed in the advertising department and we had many discussions of the value of exploitation. These informal talks were partly responsible for my determining to become an exhibitor, for one of the things that I had noted was that the established local houses rarely used any newspaper space unless they had some extraordinary attraction, and then they expected to spend a couple of dollars, give out a few passes and get half of the paper. At first the editor of the only daily in my town, and a quite creditable little four-page sheet, did not take to me very kindly, but I finally convinced him that I expected to be a regular advertiser and he agreed to co-operate with me and see whether I would be any different from the rest. Then he gave me news items day after day and we could find something new to interest the public.

My invitation affair made a hit with him and I got all sorts of publicity. Then two days before the opening I began to use display space. The editor reasoned with me against doing this, since I was selling no tickets on the opening day.

A week before my opening performance I started my orchestra to rehearsing. The musicians could see no reason for this, especially as I did not intend to pay them full wages for getting ready for permanent work, but they finally yielded to my views and went to work. The second day the leader declared that everything was letter perfect but I kept them at it just the same. The rehearsals were held just above one of the drug stores and the "corner loafers," who are so much a part of a small city, stood hour after hour and speculated on what I was about.

YOUR EXPERIENCES

Perhaps You Could Have Helped This Man with Your Ideas

THIS is the day for co-operative action. Every time you help an exhibitor in another town toward success you are helping yourself, for you are stabilizing the industry and working for general prosperity that is bound to benefit you directly.

Here is an exhibitor who is setting down frankly his experiences of his start in business. There is no doubt that many of you other exhibitors have done business building things that did not occur to this manager. We would be very glad to have you record them in the Exhibitors Service Bureau by sending us accounts of them, where possible illustrated by photographs and advertising.

You ought to follow this series of articles closely. They are written by a man who really thought when problems confronted him. You can get lots of ideas that are applicable to your house.

Rothapfel's Answers to Exhibitors

Mr. Rothapfel Will Answer Here any Questions Regarding Problems in Exhibition. The Only Conditions Are That the Questions Must Not Bear on the Merits of Particular Pictures or Services and That They Must Come Through the NEWS. Address Your Inquiries "ROTHAPFEL ADVICE, EXHIBITORS' SERVICE BUREAU, MOTION PICTURE NEWS."

XVII—I have followed very closely your answers to exhibitors and have learned much from them. Here is my problem: I know from experience that the argument of the daily change people that you can get your patrons to come to your theatre every day is a false one. I believe that it would be possible for me to use only two features a week, as I cannot show on Sundays, where I am using six now. I am sure that this could be done were I able to arrange for the music with the pictures, the proper setting around them and the remainder of the program to go with them. Yet the net result is that when the picture comes to me it is not what I expected it to be and in many cases the musical score is impossible. I was interested in reading in "Seeing the Rialto with Rothapfel" the use that you are making of "Suwanee River" in your bill this week. Yet only three weeks ago I got the musical score of another picture which had in it the greatest chance that I ever saw to use "Yankee Doodle"—and this is a New England community—yet the point was passed by when the music cue was written. I am seriously considering changing my policy from the daily change to two pictures a week. That would give me a chance to go to Boston one time a week and see the pictures that I expected to show later. Do you think it would pay me? That would be a very radical move for this community, a city of a possible 20,000.—NEW ENGLAND.

MY dear man! You are going to succeed and you are a credit to the industry. The very fact that you are able to criticise as you do in little question gives me a great deal of faith in you. That's right: Don't take the other fellow's interpretation or dope sheet for your own work. Use your own brain, and, man, you can do it too. The dope sheets at their best are not to be relied on, as there is very little interest in the work except to get it done, and, with some exceptions of course, the men who compile these dope sheets are not really able to interpret the picture as they should be, and, after all, why accept their interpretation?

Your musical library is probably limited and you cannot get a third of the numbers, and even if you could the price would be prohibitive. You have the right idea—go to Boston or any other city where you can see the picture and make your own score. The very fact that you are doing this yourself will be an inspiration and you will reap the benefit and joy of having done it yourself. Change to twice a week and use your brain, just as you have in this instance, and I can assure you that you will be successful and it won't be long before you have the finest picture theatre in your town or will go to some town where you will be really successful. I should like very much to hear from you again.

XVIII—This is probably a unique problem. Although I have a small, though the best, theatre in my community, a Pennsylvania mining town, I have decided that I would have my theatre up to date in every way, and so I employed a couple of ushers. I did not expect that this would result in any immediate increase in business, but it has had the opposite effect. I believe that my two young men are always courteous, but their experience has been that many of the miners simply brush by them and take the aisle seats, so that it is impossible to seat the house with any regard for the later comers. When these men are remonstrated with they get "sore" and declare that they will never come to the house again. I have had complaints in the past that women and children could not get comfortable seats, and that is the reason that I introduced the ushers. Can you suggest any way in which I can deal with these conditions? —MINING THEATRE.

YOUR trouble seems to be a purely executive one. I am afraid that the miners and people in your locality have never been checked and they go wherever they please. Of course this is unfortunate, but you must have power of personality enough to stand behind your boys. There is nothing like standing behind your staff when they are right.

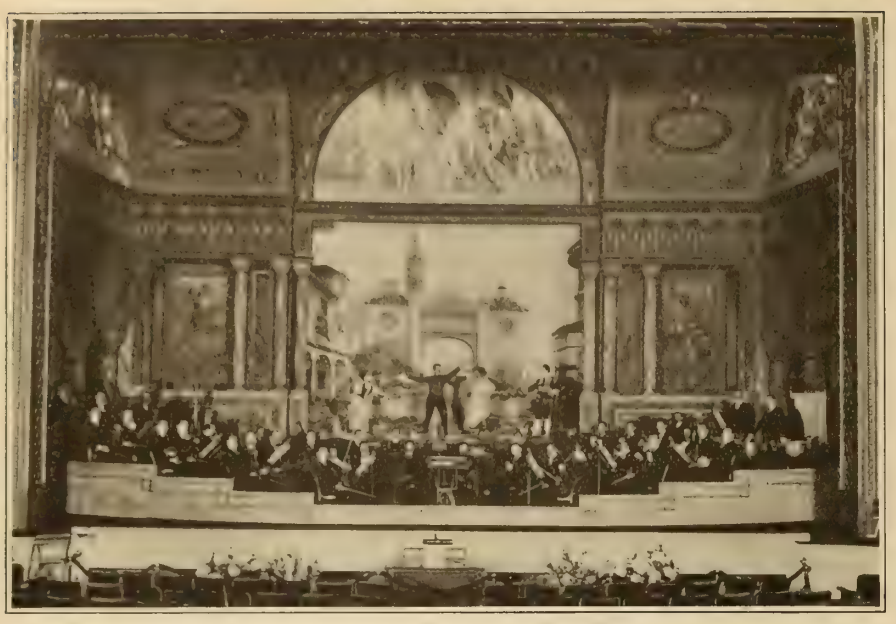
An instance of this was found in my own theatre, The Rialto, and I am going to tell you of it so as to make the matter very clear to you. Sometime ago I instructed my boys to hold a line and to let no one pass through a certain portion of the theatre. One man persisted and shoved my boy back and struck him. While we teach our boys that the patron is always right and that the patron must be shown every courtesy under any consideration, this man was instantly reported to the management, who immediately caused the arrest of the patron. He was fined a substantial sum and given a short term of imprisonment. We do not think the incident will occur again, but if it does the management will act in the same identical way.

You must have control over your institution the same as a man must have control over the steering wheel of his automobile or else it will flivver. I would suggest in your case, nevertheless, and I have had experience in mining towns, to take two girls with attractive personalities and make them ushers instead of boys. Have them dressed neatly—don't put them in monkey jackets—something simple in black, with white collars and cuffs.

Teach them to say "good afternoon" or "good evening," whatever the case may be, and you will find that the miners will not brush by them if the girls have the right stuff in them. This, in my opinion, is the best solution of your problem. Let me know how it works out.

XIX—Three months ago I booked a special feature which had been largely advertised and I decided to do something that had never been done before in my town—book it for three days. I am in a mining section of the country where there is great prosperity and where the population is widely separated. But I used posters all through my territory to advertise this picture and aroused great interest in it. I received the film about two hours before the time to run the picture and had to put it on that day, though the preliminary examination showed that the print was in terrible condition, so dim that it could scarcely be seen on the screen. I wired the exchange center, some hundred and fifty miles away, but got an answer that this was the only print available and offering to make a discount if I would continue to show the picture. Instead of that, I ordered another feature from another exchange for the other two days. Lots of people who had come by auto to see the originally advertised picture were disappointed, but I reduced the prices from those that I had advertised and gave a clean, clear picture. I know that I lost patrons all the way around, but what could I have done under such circumstances? How am I going to make an exchange furnish me a good print?—OCOEE.

THIS is a condition that is deplorable and it shows that the exchange should be very severely censured that would let a print go out of their office if it was not absolutely in the best condition for presentation.



I have no sympathy with any exchange or exchange manager who would so far forget his duty to the exhibitor and the industry as a whole, and to his employer, as to make him for one moment guilty of such negligence. I cannot say that you did right in taking off the picture. Of course I can quite readily understand why you did it, but it is better to go through sometimes and make the best of something than to disappoint a lot of people, especially after you had advertised so heavily. The very fact that the exchange offered to make a discount to you proved they were guilty and hereafter I would take such a matter up over the exchange man's head and go right to the producing company and make an issue of it.

If I were in your place, I believe I would let the public in on it and show them that you are looking after the public's welfare. You will be amazed at the co-operation you will get and the result will be that the exchange manager will never again attempt to thrust upon you such an outrage, as it will kill him in that territory, absolutely, not alone with the exhibitor but with the patrons, upon whom he depends for his very livelihood.

XX—From your experience in a small town, you probably know that the people of that community are likely to center the greater share of their interest in one star. That is the situation here. There is one male actor, whom I consider mediocre, who has more drawing power than any of the others. Any time that I can show one of his new pictures I get a packed house. I can even repeat on them and get the money. I cannot determine for the life of me what is the secret of the popularity of this fellow except that all of the women declare that he is "very handsome." But to get down to the point, what I want to know is how to exploit a star that has not equal popularity or a picture that really has no star. Further than that I want to know how to leave a lasting impression after I present a "special production." I refuse to guarantee any picture unless I know that it is good, but how can I make the people remember that? They remember your errors all right, but I cannot get the impression of success stamped upon them.—R. C. C.

UNFORTUNATELY you have the same trouble that every manager has, and it has been the great reason for the failure of so many stock companies in the small towns. I have been preaching all along that you should make your HOUSE the thing and to devote some of the energy that you use in creating a following for the star to your own theatre. You will find that by so doing other stars will be just as popular.

How the Strand theatre stage looked during the presentation of the opera "Carmen" in tabloid form. The orchestra occupied its usual place on the main stage and behind that, taking the place of the screen, was a smaller stage on which the four principals sang the chief arias from the opera.

We saw recently three advertisements of a picture that was made in a certain city where pictures are seldom made, and in not one of the displays was there reference to that fact. No doubt the news columns of the daily papers had carried stories of the making of the picture at the time and the theatre expected every one to remember that. Again that is the wrong theory. Don't expect anything. Make everything, especially your big point, stand out.

And now, in this bunch of displays selected more or less at random comes the display of the Washington theatre. And here is one of the worst handicaps that a display can provide—offense.

How would you like for some one that you did not know—or for that matter some one that you do know—to come up to your wife or sister and ask her whether she had an affinity? You would probably smash the offender in the face. And a theatre has no right to commit the same offense. Matters of good taste are just as important to the theatre as to anything else—and a little more so.

Because the writer of this advertistment has been able to show no originality either in the design of the advertisement, the selection of the type or the employment of a cut, there is no excuse for his attempting to make up for these lacks by using a line that almost carries an insult. Of course you will say that most people will overlook the offense in the line and that it will probably attract some of the scandal lovers. Which is true. But you are building your theatre, we suppose, for permanency, to make it an institution in your town, and if you are this is distinctly the wrong way.

This is a peculiar article, and you perhaps wonder at the use of taking up a number of displays and showing where they lost the proper punch, but it is only by seeing where others have made mistakes that you can save yourselves from the same course.

You can avoid most of the handicaps by a straight-away advertising, by using the smallest amount of reading matter possible after giving some striking stamp to the picture or the star.

You don't need the daring or the offensive.

You don't need to write a "book" about the picture.

Use pictures, plenty of space and plenty of white space.

Then the ad will have room to work; it will get the grip on the public and bring the people to your theatre.

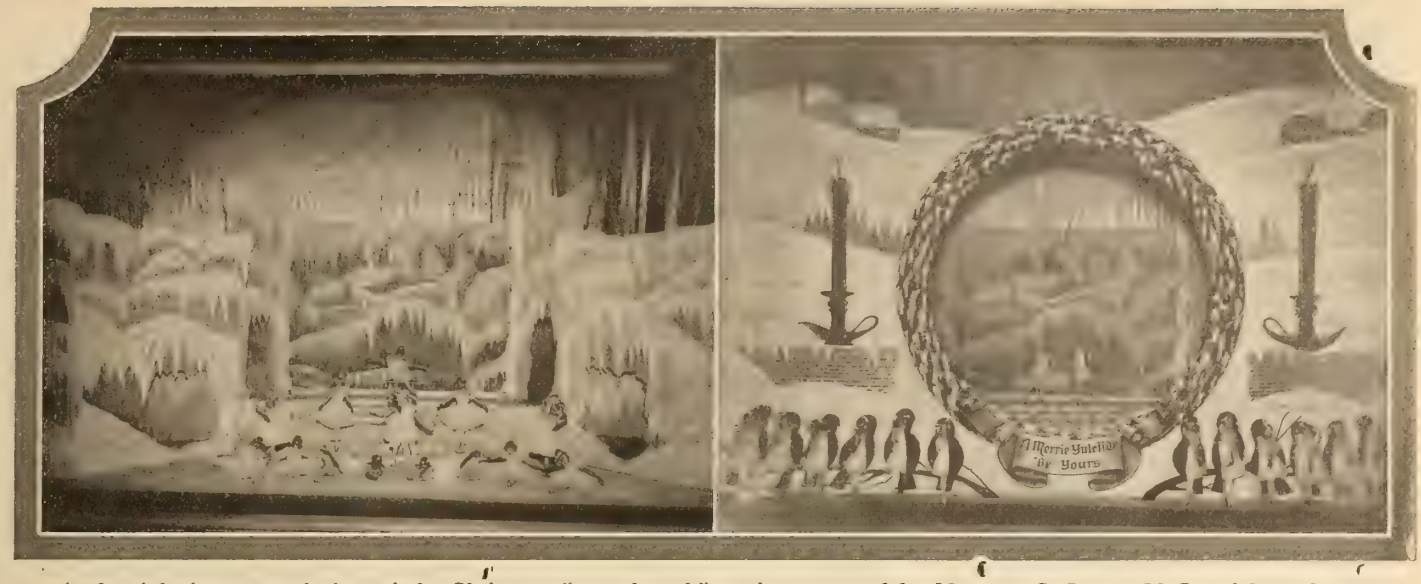
The trouble has been with you that whenever you got this man you made the most of him, which, of course, is only natural and psychologically correct, but you have been carried away by what you thought to be an irresistible duty and you gave the public what it wanted, which, of course, is also against what I am continually preaching.

Please yourself first and don't kid yourself. You will find your audiences will agree with you in the end. It is a problem that will work out all right, but don't under any condition feature the star. Make your theatre the thing. I am interested in your case and if you want to sit down and write me a long letter through the News I will be glad to help you in any way I can.

Strand Theatre Finds That Tabloid Grand Opera Pleases Public.

LAST week the News told of the first presentation of tabloid grand opera at the Strand theatre, New York, together with feature and other pictures. During the first week "Carmen" was presented and so great has been the box office return that Manager Harold Edel announces that the policy will be continued.



This is the first time on record that tabloid grand opera has been presented in a motion picture house, though, of course, there have been many instances of grand opera selections. However, in this case four singers were used and they rendered the principal arias in an excellent manner. The whole of "Carmen" was condensed into thirty minutes and really took little more time than a couple of solos would have done. It was presented in three acts with the briefest sort of intermissions. Oscar Spirescu, conductor at the Strand, collaborated with Manager Edel in the presentation of this novelty. Of course the big Strand orchestra played an important part in the presentation.

"The introduction of opera in the photoplay theatre in conjunction with a bill of screen entertainment, has proved a big success," said Mr. Edel. "The presentation of 'Carmen' in thirty minutes, was no small task, but the result is more than gratifying. The Strand is the first theatre in the country, if not the world, to present this new form of entertainment, and that in due time it will be popular throughout the entire country seems apparent. We have had record attendances the past week, and the enthusiastic applause and comments accorded our new entertainment encourage us to do even bigger things along these lines. We have dared to attempt this undertaking despite discouraging expressions on the part of various persons, and that we have made a ten-strike is disclosed in the report of our box office receipts. We have received countless congratulations on our departure in American amusements and are arranging for further offerings of this kind along even broader lines."

Thousands Get Toys at 'Frisco Theatres

Thousands of children were entertained at the Kahn and Greenfield theatres, San Francisco, during the Christmas holidays. In the sections in which the New Fillmore and the New Mission are located the merchants co-operated in making the week for the children a great success.

Ten thousand toys were purchased for distribution at each house and the merchants of the neighborhood distributed many tickets to the theatres. The lobby of each house was converted into a veritable fairyland of toys. Each child holder of ticket was given one of these, but as they were often accompanied by their parents the theatres did not suffer a financial loss from the plan.

Huge Christmas Card on the Stage and Chorus Greet Patrons of Circle Theatre

THE spectacular stage embellishment to the Christmas Week program of the Circle theatre at Indianapolis was a gorgeous scenic, electrical ballet creation, produced by S. Barret McCormick, the managing and producing director, called "The Snowflake Ballet," and presented by Mlle. Theo Hewes and corps de ballet of fifteen.

The scene was a massive affair, built and painted in the scenic studios maintained by Mr. McCormick exclusively for his scenic embellishments and stage spectacles which have become an integral part of the Circle's entertainment. The first scene disclosed, when the curtain went up, was a huge drop, fifty-five feet long and forty feet high, representing a giant Christmas card painted in brilliant colors, and all a-glitter with the tinsel and snow typical of the old-fashioned holiday greeting card.

On either side of a big holly wreath which occupied the center were two candles, their flames made to burn and splutter by a special electrical arrangement. Through the opening in the holly wreath one caught a glimpse of the deep stage setting of ice and snow grottees, on which blue and white flood lights and shifting spots made the scene glitter and glisten like a huge ice cave. At the bottom of the big Christmas Card drop a dozen painted snowbirds perched on cedar boughs, with the faces of the dancers sticking through.

Then as the lights dimmed, Mlle. Hewes and another dancer, as the spirits of Winter, glided into the scene, and taking from their purses handfuls of snow, sprinkled it upon the scene. This was the cue for the beautiful electrical snowstorm effect which flooded the scene, the dancers that typified the spirit of the snowbirds, stepped through their painted bodies to the footlights as the drop disappeared from view, disclosing the full stage, a gigantic ice and snow grotto on which myriad lights played as the ballet, with abandon, danced to the spirited and lilting strains of the ballet suite.

The dancers were all pupils of the Pierrot School of Dancing, conducted by Mlle. Theo Hewes, and included many well-known professional ballet dancers who were finishing their courses, as well as others who are about to make their professional debut.

By special arrangement with this school Mr. McCormick has the exclusive right to their theatrical appearances in his city, and the Circle is perhaps the first photo-dramatic theatre in America to include a ballet organization among its exclusive features, as well as to operate a scenic studio and department devoted to the creation of electrical and mechanical effects.

By the time of the day of the opening I had everyone in the city who could be awakened from permanent drowsiness talking about the theatre and the opening. That afternoon there were people in the town who rarely came there except on Saturdays to do their week's buying. Several of the merchants told me that they did a record business, and that gave me another idea which I put into practice later. But the main point is that they came in autos, buggies and wagons, and I had to give two shows to accommodate them all. I had people there who had never seen a motion picture—possibly some who never saw another one, but the main thing was that I had the town packed with visitors, and more than one of the town people whose invitation read for the evening performance tried to get by the door. They didn't, but they were politely told that they had overlooked the hour mentioned, and they left feeling that I hadn't got next to the little trick that they were trying to play. There is no use offending anyone, if you can get out of it.

That evening I had more people apply at the seven o'clock performance than I could have accommodated at two shows, and there was such an overflow at the nine o'clock performance that I had to announce another show at eleven. True, few people stayed up until that almost "unearthly hour," but there were a hundred or so who did so and I was given the credit even by those who did not wait for trying to do my best to take care of everyone.

YOUR PROBLEM

Don't Sit Back and Expect Someone Else to Ask

ALL exhibitors will get much profit from reading Rothapfel's Answers to Exhibitors which are printed each week in the MOTION PICTURE NEWS, but you may fail to get an answer to the one that most concerns you unless you ask the question in which you are particularly interested.

Exhibitors are notoriously loath to break the ice about anything that concerns themselves. They fear that they are giving away some business secret. That is the reason that we are not signing the names to questions, though these names and addresses are required as an evidence of good faith.

Mr. Rothapfel will answer any question provided it does not enter into the merits of a particular picture of film service and provided that these letters come through this paper. Don't be afraid to ask. Address your letter:

"Evidence," with J. Barney Sherry Featured—Circumstantial Evidence

(Triangle Five Reel Production)

"Evidence" is a Triangle production under the direction of Walter Edwards. J. Barney Sherry is in the featured role. The story was written by Jack Cunningham. In support of Mr. Sherry are seen Audelle Higgins, Howard Davis, Pauline Starke, Eugene Corey, Edwin Jobson and George Chase. "Evidence" is a strong dramatic photoplay, holding the attention of an audience from start to finish. Mr. Sherry has the part of John Corbin, famous lawyer. He makes the statement to his close friend, Dr. Richard Hyde, that any man of wealth and influence can commit murder and be acquitted if he retain the right counsel. The statement was prompted by a recent murder trial, in which a rich youth was acquitted on the grounds of insanity after he had been accused of slaying his wife. Corbin closed the discussion with the bold statement that he could kill his wife and go free. He announced that he was leaving for Boston. About to depart he was called to his apartment by a wire, and going there he sees a man leaving the apartment, and one glance at his wife tells him what had taken place. He seizes a dagger from the dresser and kills his wife. Corbin gives himself to the police and confessed. Dr. Hyde rallied to Corbin's defense. He tells of the conversation he had with Corbin, and gave his opinion that Corbin is insane. Two young men were under suspicion of robbing the Corbin apartment, and they are tried and sentenced on circumstantial evidence. Corbin is sent to an insane asylum. Corbin's son, by his first wife, was engaged to marry Dr. Hyde's daughter. Corbin is released from the asylum, and at the wedding the doctor asks Corbin if he recognizes the young man who was in his apartment the night of the murder.

J. Barney Sherry in "Evidence," a powerful drama, dealing with the course of the law, will be seen on the screen of the ———— theatre on ———— of ———— week.

Mabel Normand in "Dodging a Million," Mystery, Romance, Comedy and Thrills

(Goldwyn Six Reel Production)

Edgar Selwyn, the dramatist working in collaboration with A. M. Sullivan, has written Mabel Normand's first starring vehicle under the Goldwyn banner. It is titled "Dodging a Million," and contains the four big essentials to entertainment on the screen—mystery, romance, adventure and laughs. The production is in six reels, and was produced under the direction of George Loane Tucker, whom you all will remember as the creator of Hall Caine's "The Manx Man" for screen presentation, and Mae Marsh's late picture, "The Cinderella Man." Mr. Tucker is classed with the biggest directors in the profession. Miss Norman has as her leading man, in this production, Tom Moore, who was seen as Mae Marsh's leading man in "The Cinderella Man." Others in the cast are Armand Cortes, J. Herbert Frank, Shirley Aubert, Rita Dane, Norah Sprague and Bruce Biddle. Mabel Normand has appeared in some of the biggest comedy hits on the screen. She surpasses all her past successes in Goldwyn's production of "Dodging a Million." She presents the role of Arabella Flynn, a model in a fashionable modiste shop, who makes one morning and finds that she has inherited a fortune from a wealthy aunt who had lived in Guatemala. The lawyers, representing the estate of her aunt, gives Arabella a check for $800 and three trunks with instructions to open one after the other on three consecutive days. Arabella loses no time in moving to the most fashionable hotel where she meets Jack Forsythe, son of the corset king. Her fame as an heiress has reached the ears of the tradesmen of the city, and they all insist upon giving her credit. It develops that the three trunks contain a lot of paste jewelery, old-fashioned clothes, and some poison in a case to be used should she find her lover untrue to her. Her account with the tradesmen runs into the thousands, when the lawyer's clerk discovers that he has made a mistake in giving Arabella a $800 check. This fact reaches the ears of the tradesmen, and they become frantic. They discover that Arabella has no money. What mistake did the lawyer's clerk make?

Edward Earle is to be seen on the screen of the ———— theatre in "The Blind Adventure," which for sheer mystery and suspense is one of the best photodramas ever seen at the ———— theatre. Mr. Earle has been seen in several Vitagraph productions, but is seen for the first time in the featured role in this late work. In the supporting cast are seen Betty Howe in the leading feminine role; Frank Norcross, William Bailey, Gilbert Rooney, A. A. Stevenson,

George Wright, P. D. Standing, Eulalie Jansen and John Sturgeon. Geoffrey West is the principal character and presented by Mr. Earle. West is breakfasting at the Carlton in London when Marion Larned and her father, an American Congressman, enter. West is attracted to Marion, and to get acquainted he inserts a personal in the daily paper. Marion, next morning, reads it, and sees a reference to her. She answers, and a correspondence is started. West is fond of romance, and hits upon an idea. He writes a series of letters describing a murder in which he was the principal character. Marion believes in his story, but is unable to see him. The correspondence is kept up until the outbreak of the war, when Marion's father decides that they had better return to America. West learns of this, and decides that he has carried the romantic side of his love affair far enough. He makes desperate attempts to see Marion, but only succeeds as she and her father are boarding the steamer for America. He gets aboard and explains to her that the murder story was only a joke. But he has forgotten to get his ticket, and is arrested. Marion sees the joke, and permits him to be taken away, explaining that she will meet him in New York when he has proved himself a "gentleman."

In the supporting cast are seen Mary Martin, William Courtleigh, Jr., Wanda Petit, Walter Law, Marc Robbins and Rita Bori. The production was made by William Fox, under the direction of Frank Lloyd, who is responsible for William Farnum's big success, "Les Miserables." Mr. Lloyd directed also "The Tale of Two Cities." Mr. Farnum has the role of Barney Kemper, a big-hearted man, who sacrifices everything for his brother, Dick. It is one of the red-blooded parts for which Mr. Farnum is famous. The story, itself, is from the pen of Ralph Connor, who has written some of the most red-blooded stories of the present day. His style is something on the order of that of Jack London's, and his stories were masterpieces. "The Heart of a Lion" is a typical Farnum picture, and will be enjoyed by all—old and young, alike. A capable cast of Fox players renders strong support, and Frank Lloyd has given this photodrama an excellent production. It is difficult to point to any one picture in which Mr. Farnum has appeared and refer to a failure. The are all good—all are of the brand that American audiences like. This one is no exception. It will please the most varied audience, and the management of the ——— theatre assures you that you will enjoy every minute of the time that you spend in the ——— theatre during which "The Heart of a Lion" is projected. It will be seen on ——— of ——— week. William Farnum in his latest work, "The Heart of a Lion," from the pen of Ralph Connor.

Carey Wonderly, the original story appearing in one of the popular magazines. The production was made by Bluebird under the direction of Ida May Park, one of the few women directors. Midge had not expected such orgies as she found and went home. Rockwell accompanying her. Watkins learns that Midge is at the party, and he takes the liberty to invite himself.

HERE'S YOUR LIGHT

Make Up for the Lost Illumination with Publicity

YOU who have never done any advertising, either in the newspapers or through programs and who have been depending on electric signs are going to have to take a step forward. So long as the coal famine lasts there isn't going to be much chance for the big night displays again in front of your house.

But that is not going to affect your business if you avail yourself intelligently of the ways that are open to you. One of the first things essential is the study of your pictures and to tell your public about them further in advance. Get your patrons interested, before they would have been had you relied only on signs.

Rewrite from these Ad Talks little paragraphs of interest for your newspaper and your program. You can find something here that you can use a week or more in advance and stir up the interest. Then use them complete in your reading notices in the local papers just before you show the pictures.

Clip them and file them now: They'll help take the place of the electric signs.

Carlyle Blackwell and Evelyn Greeley in "His Royal Highness"—Adventure

(World Five-Reel Production)

Carlyle Blackwell and Evelyn Greeley are co-starred in "His Royal Highness," to be seen on the screen of the ——— theatre on ——— of ——— week. He is a reckless sort of fellow, the happy-go-lucky kind, and because of his adventures is kept in hot water most of the time. His chum at the university is a studious young foreigner who is called to his native country of France. The football hero is invited to go along. In Paris the two start out to explore the underworld and see the sights of the night life. They meet the leader of the Apaches, a girl, whom they attempt to rescue from her evil companions and a fight follows, which is staged with all the realism of the actuality. It develops that the foreigner is heir to the crown of a small principality, and that he is a prince traveling incognito. The prince has been badly hurt in the fight, and is taken to the hospital. The football hero is called upon to impersonate the prince. He starts to assume the duties of the crowned heads. The friends of the usurper hear of his coming and plan to assassinate him. The adventure starts, and what happens is told in a most entertaining manner in this latest World picture featuring Carlyle Blackwell and Evelyn Greeley.

Then the race starts. Margie is in love with Billy until Harold Vandeveer comes into her life and then it becomes a "toss-up." Billy is outgeneraled in every move he starts, but he sticks and eventually wins out. Before he does, however, there is a cross-country chase, a mad hold-up by bad men, a ride in a box car and a thrilling climax. "The Fighting Grin" is a laugh from start to finish. New Specials Cast a Shadow

Freuler and Hutchinson, in New York Intimate New Organization Will Produce Series for Mutual Release—Details Lacking

SAMUEL S. HUTCHINSON and John R. Freuler, it became known last week, have been in New York in connection with negotiations preliminary to the production of a number of special feature pictures. .

According to all that can be learned of the present plans, it is expected the specials will be made by a separate organization working on the West Coast with the Santa Barbara studios of the American Film Company, Inc., as headquarters. It is to be assumed that these specials will be made available to exhibitors through the exchanges of the Mutual Film Corporation, although no official announcements to that effect have been made.

"We have found certain marked tendencies which assure us that to a considerable proportion of theatres a series of occasional big special productions will have a particular value in the coming year," said Mr. Freuler. "There are basic reasons for this trend, representing an evolution in the business of presenting pictures. This will not affect our handling of star productions featuring 'big stars only,' including the Mary Miles Minter, Margarita Fischer, William Russell, Edna Goodrich, the Charles Frohman plays and others.

"Mr. Hutchinson is conferring with a number of available authors and stars who will be at liberty for contracts at the periods planned for the special features. We are starting amply in advance to insure careful preparation for every aspect of these pictures. I am not just now in a position to make any announcements relating to the stars and casts of these specials, but I can say most assuredly that these pictures will, unlike those of today, present both a real star and a real story."

De Luxe Picks Kenyon Subject

President Deitrich Secures "The Street of Seven Stars" from Mary Roberts Rinehart—Is New Company's First

DE LUXE PICTURES CORPORATION, INC., which was formed recently to produce features, and which secured Doris Kenyon as its first star, has selected its first subject, according to announcements this week. This is a story by Mary Roberts Rinehart, called "The Street of the Seven Stars," and which was published serially in The Saturday Evening Post.

President Theodore C. Deitrich, of De Luxe Pictures is said to have personally looked after the negotiations with Mrs. Rinehart for her story, which will in picture form star Miss Kenyon at the head of her own company.

In announcing the closing of the agreement for the story, De Luxe made the following statement: "Many attempts have been made to secure from Mrs. Rinehart the motion picture rights of this story, but up to the present time she has withheld them pending a proposition whereby a suitable star could be secured for the portrayal of the heroine. As soon as Mrs. Rinehart learned that the story was intended for Miss Kenyon, she enthusiastically agreed to the sale of the rights to De Luxe Pictures, Inc., declaring Miss Kenyon to be ideal for the part. 'Miss Kenyon's beauty, her girlishness, and her personal charm, together with her marked dramatic ability will be important factors tending to the great success of her appearance as the heroine of "The Street of Seven Stars,"' declared Mrs. Rinehart. 'I consider "The Street of Seven Stars" my most beautiful and artistic story.'"

Jean Paige in Comedies for Vitagraph

Jean Paige, whom Vitagraph has featured in several of its O. Henry releases produced under the direction of Martin Justice, will shortly be presented in a new Vitagraph comedy, "The Four-Cornered Triangle," in which Edward Earle and Agnes Ayres will be featured.

This series of comedies is being directed by Graham Baker, and Vitagraph declares they are very popular. In the stock company making the comedies are Denton Vane, Templar Saxe, Adele DeGarde, Patsy DeForest and others.

Looks Like All-Star

In the cast of Artcraft's production of "The Whispering Chorus," directed by Cecil B. DeMille, are Kathlyn Williams, Raymond Hatton, Elliott Dexter, Edythe Chapman, John Burton, Harkes Jones, Tully Marshall, Guy Oliver, W. H. Brown, James Neill, Noah Berry, Gustav von Seffertitz, Walter Lynch, Edna Mae Copper and others will be seen in important roles.

Kitty Gordon Features Close Together

The next two picture subjects in which Kitty Gordon appears for World-Pictures Brady-Made have been announced for release a little more than a month apart. The first "The Divine Sacrifice," is to be released February 4, according to plans, and the second, "The Wasp," will follow on March 11.

In the former Miss Gordon portrays a woman who gives up her dearest hopes for the sake of her daughter. In the latter, as the title implies, she is a person with whom it is not the safest pursuit in the world to trifle.

Rothapfel Uses Kalem Scenic Gems

Manager S. L. Rothapfel, of the Rialto and the new Rivoli theatres in New York, presented as one of his features for the week of January at the latter theatre views of the Holy Land, photographed by the Kalem Company during a search for locations in the production of "From the Manger to the Cross."

The capture of Jerusalem by the British has greatly aroused public interest in pictures of this nature, apparently.

For this reel at the Rivoli, Manager Rothapfel selected scenes from four Kalem subjects, and followed the picture with a number from Carl Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba," with a costumed soloist and chorus in a special setting.

Essanay Pleased by Comments of Critics

Essanay last week announced itself as satisfied with the comment on Mary McAlister's newest picture, "Sadie Goes to Heaven," which, according to the company, was favorable.

Wilson Transferred to Chicago Office

G. W. Wilson, representative of the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation in Cincinnati, has been transferred to the Chicago headquarters. Mr. Wilson reports business flourishing in the Middle West, and says that by Spring the reported depression in other sections of the country will have given way to a nation-wide boom in the film industry.

Pathe Plans Still More Serials

Four of These Productions Are Now Under Way, One of Which Stars Pearl White with Antonio Moreno—Called Best Yet Done by Pathe

PATHE'S increased activity in the feature field, as illustrated by the announcement of the Pathe Plays policy for the present year, in MOTION PICTURE NEWS, is to be accompanied by a correspondingly gauged increase in serial producing facilities, according to an announcement this week from the executive offices.

Four serials are said to be already under way, the first of which stars Pearl White with Antonio Moreno and is called "The House of Hate."

Is Pathe's Best

It is claimed by Pathe that this serial will be by far the biggest thing Pathe has ever done in the serial line, and that it is to be the forerunner of a serial program for 1918 such as has never before been attempted by any company.

It is now revealed that Pathe's plans, which with the immense resources of the company behind them are counted upon to place it on the topmost rung of the feature-play ladder, also call for an unprecedented increase in time, effort and money spent on serials. The purpose of it is to keep their quality up to the new standard set by the Better-Pictures-All-the-Time-Policy, which, with the announcement of a continued effort to assure exhibitors reasonable profits, is the outstanding feature of Pathe's 1918 statement of ideas and ideals.

The transcontinental trip of J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager, accompanied by a nation-wide investigation of exhibitor conditions in general and as regards Pathe in particular, reveal considerable discontent which, it is claimed by Pathe, its policies are doing considerable to decrease. Indications as to the future point to a satisfactory adjustment as the logical result of reaction, according to those who are close to the Pathe chief.

An important feature of Pathe's analysis is the fact that good serials are wanted now more than ever before, the future demand, however, pointing to a class of picture which has rarely been seen in the output of any company, but which exhibitors say has been best approximated in Pearl White's "The Fatal Ring."

Much Care Required

"The making of a good serial is a difficult thing, the secret being so elusive that many companies have tried again and again and found the path anything but strewn with roses," said F. C. Quimby in discussing the plans of the company to produce the last word in serials.

Mr. Quimby went on to quote figures showing the success of past Pathe serials, as follows: "Just as such magazines as the Saturday Evening Post, Cosmopolitan, Pictorial Review, etc., have built immense guaranteed circulations through serials the great majority of theatres have found the continued story the best means of guaranteeing patronage. Pearl White is without any doubt the greatest serial star, her popularity with the public being evidenced by the fact that more than $25,000,000 has been paid by the people of the country alone to see her in 'the Perils of Pauline,' 'The Exploits of Elaine,' 'The Iron Claw,' 'Pearl of the Army' and 'The Fatal Ring.' More than four thousand theatres have already booked the last named serial despite the comparatively short time it has been out.

"Having been voted the most popular actress in America by both Army and Navy units of the American fighters, now is the psychological time for her to make another appearance. Antonio Moreno is one of the most popular male stars on the screen. With girls who make up such an important part of picture audiences earning more than ever before, it is reasonable to presume that his public will also increase."

Pearl White, with Antonio Moreno, is starred in "The House of Hate," which Pathe declares will be the best of its kind ever filmed

Explains Settings

Mr. Quimby proceeded: "An example of the settings is this. There is one set showing an old time armor hall in a castle about five or six hundred years old. It has an old stone staircase which looks as if it stepped right out of the middle ages, a long hall, at the other end of which is a library. Action takes place here which allows the use of various combinations of rooms, a full set of the whole with action at the far end and coming down to the camera the scene shot through different light effects which, of course, center on the action. The result is one of the most beautiful things ever seen on the screen. Everyone noticed especially the fine sets in 'The Fatal Ring.' Those in 'The House of Hate' are twice as beautiful and then some.

"The story development of this serial is something entirely new, allowing the carrying on of a really dramatic plot without in any way eliminating the thrilling scenes and fast action which the public wants.

"The episodes develop with a strong exposition of dramatic situations leading up to a powerful climax preceded by unprecedented speedy action. I believe that the new handling of the story in the scenarios will be one of the outstanding features of this serial.

"George B. Seitz seems able to do stunts in an entirely new way and the originality shown in this regard make each situation seem different from anything ever seen before. An element of 'The House of Hate' to which we direct especial attention is that it is an entirely new type of mystery story. In past mystery serials, too often you said when you saw the last episode, that something was deliberately left out of episode one or two in order to fool the audience. But ours is not that kind."

Mutual Names Minter Coming Subject

"Beauty and the Rogue" has been selected as the title for Mary Miles Minter's forthcoming Mutual-American feature release, a five-reel production scheduled for January 28.

William Fox Enlarges Studios

Prepares for What He Believes Will Be Banner Year for Pictures—Eight Stages Active in West Coast Studios.

PREPARING for what he believes will be one of the biggest years in the history of the motion picture industry, William Fox has enlarged his studios in the east and west.

A little over two years ago, in December, 1915, Mr. Fox sent his first company of motion picture players to Los Angeles. William Farnum headed the pioneer organization of about thirty persons. Now the Fox Film Corporation has expanded in California from a concern originally covering less than an acre of ground to one owning five acres in Hollywood, fifteen on Western avenue, and ten acres on location at Silver Lake, Fernando Valley and Chatsworth. Where there were at first only two stages, Mr. Fox now has eight in constant use, and will in all probability be compelled to build more within the near future.

The Fox forces now have working regularly on the Coast four dramatic companies and five comedy companies, in addition to the periodic production of such spectacular productions as "Cleopatra," "Jack and the Beanstalk," "Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp," "The Babes in the Woods," "Treasure Island," "The Spy," "Du Barry" and others.

Mr. Fox also has expanded in the east. He has taken over the former Victor studio at 638 West Forty-third street, New York City, and already has a company working there.

Paralta Tries Out a New Scenario Plan

PARALTA PLAYS, INC., this week, announced itself as very greatly satisfied with its recently inaugurated idea in securing and passing upon scenarios, and considers the move ample proof that President Carl Anderson displayed unusual foresight along new lines when he established the Eastern Scenario Department of Paralta Plays at the company's New York offices.

Paralta maintains a producing scenario department at its California studios, and many of its stories are written by staff writers, but to assure enough material with proper variety of subject and treatment, it is Mr. Anderson's intention to purchase a number of stories from outside sources, through the Eastern Scenario Department. The branch of Paralta is in charge of Harry Chandlee, who has been instructed to reject no story until he is certain that it contains nothing which can be utilized to advantage by Paralta. On Mr. Chandlee's force are Helen Christene Hoerle and Elizabeth Peterson, both of whom have contributed stories to the screen. It is their duty to make any changes in scenarios received which can be used after these corrections are made. Paralta declares that an added advantage to this system lies in the fact that the story, when finally sent to the Los Angeles studios, is worked out from a picture standpoint, and thus the making of the continuity is greatly facilitated.

Paralta announces that already the Eastern Department has increased the available material something over 100 per cent.

Williams Party Arrives on Coast

Earle Williams and his company of Vitagraph players arrived in Los Angeles Christmas morning and were met at the station by such Western Vitagraphers as could absent themselves from the Hollywood Studio and all enjoyed a Christmas dinner in the Alexandria Hotel. In Mr. Williams' party were Grace Darmond, who will be his leading woman, Hedda Nova and Frank Glendon, who will be featured together in Vitagraph's forthcoming serial, "The Woman in the Web"; Tom Mills, director, Frank Heath, assistant director, Fred Held, cameraman, and Mrs. Darmond. The receiving party included W. S. Smith, studio manager, Dave Smith, director, both brothers of Albert E. Smith, president of Vitagraph, William Duncan and Carol Holloway, stars in the Wolfville pictures, "Dead Shot Baker" and "The Tenderfoot" and the two big serials, "The Fighting Trail" and "Vengeance—and the Woman," Nell Shipman and Alfred Whitman, Lawrence Semon, director-comedian and Earl Montgomery and Joe Rock, working in the Big V Comedies and others.

Petrova Takes Her Company to Florida

Madame Olga Petrova, accompanied by several members of her production organization, left New York a few days ago, bound for Florida. The destination of the Petrova troupe is Miami, at which point the company will take up quarters for the purpose of filming the various exteriors called for in the third Petrova production, "The Life Mask." The trip is a special one, made in order to secure the necessary atmosphere required by the story of the anonymous author.

Director Frank Crane was in charge of the company together with Eddie James, assistant director; George Lane, photographer; Micky Whalen, assistant photographer, and a corps of property men, carpenters and electricians.

Thomas Holding, leading man of the Petrova outfit, Edith Hinckle, Jean Burnell and Edward Burns were also in the party and will appear in support.

"Revenge" Claims Atmosphere of West

An announcement from Metro's publicity department this week advises that plenty of real Western atmosphere is being secured for the Metro Star Series production, "Revenge," which is being produced at the West Coast studios at Hollywood, with Edith Storey as star. Tod Browning, who has directed previous pictures with Miss Storey, is directing "Revenge."

Accent is placed by Metro on the statement that in this picture Miss Storey returns to the "Western" type of role in which she first became well known.

Wheeler Oakman is the male lead, and Ralph Lewis, the heavy, is prominently cast, it is announced.

Retain Drama in Empey's War Picture

In announcing the advance which has been made in the production of the patriotic feature, "Over the Top," which Vitagraph has put under way with Sergeant Guy Empey and Lois Meredith in the leading parts, President Albert E. Smith calls attention to the statement that the dramatic high lights of Empey's book from which the picture is taken are being retained.

Wilfrid North is directing the production, the interior scenes of which are said to have progressed nicely within the past week. It is planned by President Smith to begin work on exteriors shortly.

Jaxon Comedies Rearranged

General Film Company this week announced the following new line-up for the remainder of the new series of Jaxon comedies, following "The Inspector's Wife," which is the current release: "In Wrong," "Anybody's Money," "Her Fatal Shot," "Marooned," "Sherman Was Right," "What Will Happen Next?" and "Which Was Lucky?"

"Blue Blazes Rawden" for Bill Hart

When William S. Hart flashes his shooting-irons for the next Artcraft feature, in which he is the star, it will be in "Blue Blazes Rawden," it was announced this week by Artcraft. This picture, it is said, will follow "Wolves of the Rail," which has been completed.

In the cast with Hart will appear Maud George, Gertrude Claire, Hart Hoxie, Robert McKim and Robert Gordon.

The story of "Blue Blazes Rawden" concerns the adventures of a giant lumberman of the North Woods, who leaves the wilderness in search of the life and lights of the lumber camp saloons.

Collins Receives Letter from Rothapfel

Concerning Madame Petrova's initial production as head of her own company, which was presented recently at the Rialto in New York, Petrova Pictures Corporation has made public the following letter which S. L. Rothapfel wrote to Frederick L. Collins, president of Petrova Pictures:

"You no doubt will be very much pleased to learn that we have just finished with the Petrova picture, "The Daughter of Destiny," at the Rialto, where it ran during the week of December 23, to a business of $17,500, and in spite of the fact that the worst Sunday and Monday in the year (the two days before Christmas) came during that week and were followed by four of the most bitterly cold days known in the history of New York, there were lines of people a block long waiting to get into the theatre. The picture was very much liked and was a huge success, and I know that if Madame continues this standard there can be but one result and that is success."

Paralta Engages Louise Glaum

Intends to Star Her at Head of Her Own Company, Plans for Which Are Taking Shape—Five Stars Now in List.

LOUISE GLAUM, the first leading woman in motion pictures to produce the art of vampiring before the camera, and who about two months ago withdrew from active work in the silent drama following the expiration of her contract with Ince-Triangle, has been engaged by Paralta Plays, Inc., through President Carl Anderson, it was announced last week.

It is understood that Paralta has contracted with well-known authors for several stories especially written for its newest star, as it is the announced intention of President Anderson to bring forth to the best advantage in so far as is possible the peculiar style of art of Miss Glaum. In this connection it is expected she will go in for a broader scope of emotional acting and less of the vampire type.

With Paralta Plays it is said Miss Glaum will have her own producing company, but just who her director will be has not yet been announced, as neither has the title of her first feature.

The list of Paralta stars, in addition to Miss Glaum, now includes Bessie Barriscale, Lois Wilson, Henry B. Walthall and Warren J. Kerrigan.

Miss Glaum made her debut on the stage as a member of a stock company in Chicago. She later appeared in roles with Nat Goodwin in his Los Angeles Stock Company, after which she spent several seasons on the road in dramatic productions. She then went to California, where she appeared before the motion picture camera, under the direction of Thomas H. Ince. Her screen appearances include "The Aryan," "Honor Thy Name," "The Wolf Woman," "The Weaker Sex," "The Return of 'Draw' Egan" and "The Sweetheart of the Doomed."

Emerson-Loos Join Paramount

Jesse L. Lasky Engages Them to Produce Series of Dramas—Pair Considered Exceptionally Valuable Acquisition

JOHN EMERSON and Anita Loos, director and collaborator, respectively, who came to New York a few weeks ago following the termination of their contract with Douglas Fairbanks, have been engaged by Jesse L. Lasky, of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, to provide a series of picture dramas for release by Paramount, it was announced this week.

The company, in its announcement, declares it intends to make the pictures distinctly individual, and will call them the John Emerson and Anita Loos Productions for Paramount.

On the occasion of the signing of the contract with Emerson and Miss Loos, Mr. Lasky said: "There is little need for me to point out the fact that this new affiliation is one that we are all glad to see consumated. The work of Mr. Emerson and Miss Loos speaks for itself. Judged by their past achievements, their success in the future is assured. Exhibitors and public have come to know the value of the Emerson-Loos collaboration in the picture drama, a collaboration, however, that demands and must receive the support of an organization prepared to give the proper artistic attention to the needs of production.

"I believe Mr. Emerson and Miss Loos will find in their new activities for Paramount that artistic attention without which the best brains in the business cannot get results."

Mr. Emersons's first activties in the motion picture field, which he entered from the legitimate end of the business, were with Triangle in the production of "Old Heidelberg." As director for Douglas Fairbanks, he attained a great degree of picture experience and attendant fame in the production of "His Picture in the Paper," "Down to Earth," "The Americano," "Reaching for the Moon," and others, in all of which Miss Loos acted as collaborator of scenario.

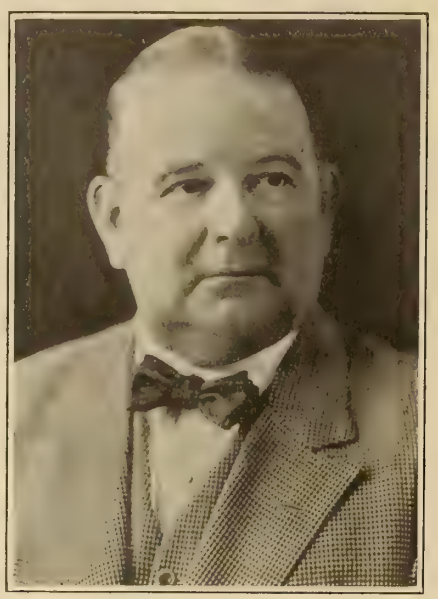
Triangle Dramas Move Forward

Four Companies in Various Stages of Production While Four Directors Wait for Subjects—Wells Takes a Trip



ACCOMPANIED by some of the huskiest members of the Triangle playing forces, Director Raymond Wells and company went to Colton, Calif., for a week to do the opening scenes of a coming Triangle offering, "The Hard Rock Breed," a screen adaptation of Frederic Bechdolt's magazine story of the same title. Four other drama companies are in various stages of production at the Culver City studios and four directors, Cliff Smith, Walter Edwards, Jack Dillon and Jack Conway, are waiting for new vehicles.

Director Wells' new story deals with the life of those sturdy men who spend their time burrowing into the bowels of the earth for hard rock, the foundation of civilization. J. Barney Sherry and Jack Curtis are two typical hard rock men in this story.

Cliff Smith, director of Triangle Western thrillers, in which Roy Stewart, cowboy star, plays the leads, has finished his latest picture, "Keith of the Border," for February release. Smith and his company of cowboys spent the last day of the old year at the ranch studio, Hartville, with an impromptu rodeo in which the punchers tried out the bucking horses in preparation for the next Western subject of the Triangle, which calls for some outlaw bronco riding.

Director E. Mason Hopper is well under way on his latest Triangle story, "The Answer," featuring Alma Ruebens and including in the supporting cast Joe King, Francis McDonald, Jean Hersholt and Claire Anderson.

An entire glass stage was covered by a spacious hotel set at the Triangle studios and was used for the opening scenes in Director Gilbert P. Hamilton's latest Triangle picture, featuring Belle Bennett. The working title of this picture is "A Soul in Trust," a story of Southern society life. Supporting Miss Bennett in this picture are Darrel Foss, J. Barney Sherry, Lillian West, Grover Franke, Wilbur Higbee and W. A. Jeffries.

George Hernandez, of Triangle

The Clara Morris wardrobe, one of the treasures of the Triangle Culver City costume department, has been brought to light again and is being used in the filming of "The Sea Panther," a story of swashbuckling pirates in which William Desmond is seen in the title role. When leaving for location work at the harbor, Director Thomas Heffron's company looks like a musical comedy troupe on a day's outing.

The script calls for considerable sword play and "Bill" Desmond and the well-known Triangle villain, Jack Richardson, are now spending their spare moments slashing holes in the atmosphere, preparing for their coming duel.

"Rough and Ready" Begun by Bill Farnum

A NEW de luxe production, which the producer, William Fox, declares will be of unusual dramatic strength, was begun a few days ago with William Farnum in the star part. The picture bears the tentative title of "Rough and Ready," and is being made under the supervision of Richard Stanton.

"Much time has been devoted by Mr. Stanton and his staff in the preparatory work for this new Standard Picture," said Mr. Fox, "and the supporting company is of exceptional quality. The names of the members will be made public during the week. The 'script is by Mr. Stanton and Ed. Sedgwick from an original story of which they are the joint authors.

"The combination and co-operation of William Farnum and Richard Stanton on a film of precisely the kind for which Mr. Farnum is best known and in which he shines so brightly, insures picturegoers of an extraordinary feature. Our present intentions are to issue this subject late in February.

"William Farnum has been the hero of more than a score of brilliant plays for the shadow stage and he stands perhaps unrivalled in his portrayal of the vigorous manly type on the screen. His physique fits him for the impersonation of the most rugged and courageous characters and his histrionic power is unquestioned. His recent work in 'Les Miserables,' directed by Frank Lloyd, has been unanimously acclaimed one of the finest contributions to the gallery of appreciable and enduring cinema portraits.

Jacksonville Throngs with Film Folk

The city of Jacksonville, Fla., is fast coming into its own as one of the foremost centers of film production, especially when exterior work is considered. The town has recently had companies to the number of six active at once on subjects ranging all the way from comedy to drama.

"Fumbled Fortunes" is the title of the first comedy being produced by the Florida Funny Films Company in Jacksonville under the direction of Harold Josh Binney, and featuring "Funny Fatty" Filbert. Mr. Binney expects to soon have his first picture ready for release, which will be on state rights' basis, it is announced.

George Larkin and associates have leased the Thanhouser Studio and will begin the production of a 25-reel 12-episode serial from the pen of Mr. Larkin. Ollie Kirby will be the female lead, and Bob Ellis will direct the company.

Under the direction of Kenean Buel, Jane and Katherine Lee, the Fox kiddie stars, are in Jacksonville to make a few scenes in a forthcoming production.

Pearl White and a company of Pathe players are in town on a Javanese serial. Several scenes will be made in the tropical scenery near the city.

Madge Kennedy and a company of Goldwyn players have been in Jacksonville on a forthcoming production.

Director Jack Noble has used over 20,000 people altogether in several scenes in "The Birth of a Race," which he is making near Jacksonville for the Frohman Amusement Corporation.

Alice Brady and her company of World players have returned to New York after spending several days in Jacksonville on a picture.

Triangle Delves Into Capt. Kidd's Life

If dispatches from the west coast are not amiss, the research department at the Triangle Culver City studio is busy pouring over the life and infamous deeds of the renowned Captain Kidd and other well-known pirates, in quest of the "atmosphere" needed for a massive Triangle production, "The Sea Panther," in which an all-star cast has started work under the direction of Thomas N. Heffron.

Much of the action takes place about 1680, and Count d'Elba, the director in charge, has looked to Captain Kidd's history for much of the necessary material.

Crisp Comes East to Direct Reid

Donald Crisp, the Paramount director who was married to Marie Stark a few days before Christmas, and who, incidentally, has been placed under a new Paramount contract that insures his services for that organization during this year at least, has been dispatched from California to New York to direct Wallace Reid.

Following the completion of the Wallace Reid picture, it is said to be likely that Crisp will return to the West Coast to direct other Paramount subjects.

Jewel Changes Title of New Picture

Jewel Productions, Inc., announced this week that it has decided to change the title of the next release from "K" to "The Doctor and the Woman."

This feature, according to Jewel, will be one of the most beautiful productions released this season, and in it Mildred Harris is said to appear to better advantage than ever before.

She scenario is an adaptation of the Mary Roberts Rinehart novel, "K," as published by Houghton Mifflin & Co., and was directed by Lois Weber. True Boardman appears as the mysterious doctor "K" and Miss Harris as the heroine. The exact date of release has not been announced.

Large Sets at Biograph

To gain an idea of the equipment and facilities available at the Biograph studios, New York, producers should note the elaborate sets in "Lest We Forget," according to the studio management. The sets are said to be unusually large and the light effects good, and are cited as a good example of what producers can do when staging a production at the Biograph studios.

Lee Children Visit Florida Town

Jane and Katherine Lee, accompanied by their mother and the company which appears with them in William Fox pictures, have been in Jacksonville, Fla., for scenes in a picture which Kenean Buel is directing, but which has as yet been given no title.

The Lee children from Jacksonville went to Philadelphia, where they were scheduled to make about fifteen personal appearances in picture houses during the showing of one of their pictures.

Wanda Petit Ends Year in Pictures

Wanda Petit has been for the past few days celebrating the event of her first anniversary in motion pictures, all of which time she has been with William Fox.

Miss Petit has advanced from small parts to leading woman, and has appeared with William Farnum, George Walsh and Tom Mix. She is at present at Hollywood.

Pennington Feature Well Under Way

The Famous Players-Lasky studios in New York are the scene of activities for the production of "Sunshine Nan," Ann Pennington's next picture for Paramount. It was announced last week that work on this subject is progressing nicely, and that the cast shows promise of being exceptionally good. Among the players in Miss Pennington's support are John Hines, Richard Barthelmess, Charles Eldridge and Mrs. Lewis McCord.

The story is of the slums, with the star as a typical "alley rat," and is said to have many human types.

Keystone Comedians Keep Busy

New Laugh-Makers Are Under Way and Some Are Receiving Finishing Touches—New Players Added Recently.

WITH three new comedies under way and two undergoing their finishing touches the Triangle-Keystone fun makers opened the new year with a rush.

Albert Glassmire, supervisor of comedy direction, has a long list of subjects ready to be put in film form. To meet the big demand which will be made upon the Triangle-Keystone forces within the next twelve months, the various companies have been augmented by the acquisition of several players.

Director Charles Avery, who completed "A Janitor's Fall" last week, is already busy on a new offering, called "A Good Elk." In the cast are Joseph Belmont, Ruth Langston, Eugene Corey, Myrtle Reeves, Arthur Moon, Frank Bonn, and Marion Torrey.

Director Harry Edwards has begun work on "A Rough Diamond," and has made rapid progress on the filming of some interior sets. Featured in the big cast will be Paddy McQuire and Chris Richards.

Rae Godfrey, one of the Triangle-Keystone forces of former days, is again back with the Triangle comedy companies, and is also working at Culver City under Director Edwards in "A Rough Diamond."

Director William Beaudine has been engaged for several days with an all-star cast, assisted by a big troupe of extras, in picturing exteriors for "Slinging It."

Director Reggie Morris' latest work, "Did She Do Wrong?" is said to be a "scream" from start to finish. Harry Gribbon, Myrtle Lind, Frank Bonn and Milburn Moranti were among the players in the cast.

Triangle-Keystone Director Herman Raymaker, whose latest comedy, "A Lady Killer's Doom," was also photographed during the holiday season, was pleasantly remembered by all the members of the cast. Just before the final scenes were "shot," Billy Franey and Dale Fuller, in behalf of the players, presented Raymaker with a silver cigarette case suitably engraved.

"A Lady Killer's Doom" is a burlesque on the draft that is said to be brimful of laughable situations, and shows the part women are playing along certain war lines. Billy Franey, Dale Fuller and Maud Wayne are among the featured players. Raymaker had the troupe down to the ocean side for several days.

Bushman and Bayne in "Under Suspicion"

BUSHMAN AND BAYNE, under the direction of Will S. Davis, are well started on the Metro production of "Under Suspicion," it was announced this week. Particular stress is placed by Metro on the statement that a cast of well-known players are supporting the co-stars in this picture, which was adapted by Albert Shelby LeVino from a story called "The Woolworth Diamonds."

Hugh Jeffrey, who has long been a Metro player, has the prominent part of Rogers, the valet of Gerry Simpson (Francis X. Bushman). For Metro Jeffrey has appeared in "The Wager" with Emily Stevens, "A Magdelene of the Hills" with Mabel Taliaferro, and "The Call of Her People" with Ethel Barrymore.

Eva Gordon, who has played for several motion picture companies in Continental Europe, makes her American screen debut in the role of the wealthy widow, Mrs. Alice Woolworth.

Frank Montgomery plays the part of Sweeney, Chief of the Central Office detectives. He has appeared for Metro in "The Brand of Cowardice" with Lionel Barrymore and Grace Valentine, "The Call of Her People" with Ethel Barrymore, and "A Magdalene of the Hills" with Mabel Taliaferro, besides numerous other productions.

Sidney D'Albrook, who registered a hit as the Italian in Metro's patriotic picture, "Draft 258," with Mabel Taliaferro, is cast as Murphy, a plain-clothes man. Arthur Housman, who has appeared in several Metro plays, including "Red, White and Blue Blood," with Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne, is seen as Red Hogan, a crook. Jack Newton, last seen in Metro's "Alias Mrs. Jessop," with Emily Stevens, plays the part of Cassidy, a detective, and Franklyn Hanna, who has played in several Metro pictures, plays the Chief of Detectives.

Brenon Takes an Inventory

Resume of His Activities During Past Year Discloses Satisfactory Conditions in Producing and Releasing Pictures

HERBERT BRENON, through his Department of Exploitation, has taken an inventory of his activities during the year 1917, and announced this week that everything was found to be very satisfactory.

The passing of the old year, it is disclosed, leaves Mr. Brenon with no less than four features to his credit, and this record he considers an enviable one. The productions have differed widely from one another, it is cited, and each has attained what is said to be satisfactory success. Three of them have been shown on Broadway, and have had special runs of their own before being turned over to the exhibitor.

Two other features have been completed at the Brenon studio on Hudson Heights, and will be released through the First National Exhibitors' Circuit.

In summing up Mr. Brenon's productions during 1917, the Department of Exploitation said: "'The Lone Wolf' was the first of Mr. Brenon's pictures of the year to achieve distinction. It was his first melodrama, and is still playing throughout the country. Next came 'The Fall of the Romanoffs.' It portrayed history in the making, dealing with the striking events that led up to the Russian revolution, and the abdication of the Czar. It met with the instantaneous enthusiasm of both press and public, and was described as 'the screen's biggest achievement'—'Brenon's masterpiece.'

"'Empty Pockets,' a melodrama of a different type, has recently been turned over to the First National Exhibitors' Circuit. 'The Passing of the Third Floor Back,' with Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, has also been completed. Both of these productions will be seen at New York's leading theatres within the next few weeks and present indications are that they will be as popular as the preceding ones."

Blackton Likens West Coast to Italy

J. STUART BLACKTON, who recently journeyed to California for the first time after touring nearly all of the balance of the world, has announced himself well satisfied with the Sunset State, where he is making "Wild Youth" for Paramount.

In referring to California, Mr. Blackton said: "There are wonderful vistas that are exactly like those I have found in the country of the Latins. There is frequently a resemblance architecturally, for I note many little villas tucked away in hollows of the side hills, or perched upon an eminence, vine and flower covered, and overlooking some bit of water or a spreading landscape dotted with picturesque homes. I feel almost at home, though I have never before been in California, and I can say truthfully that I like everything here, including the people.

"I have been renewing old acquaintances and making new ones every day," he continued. "I frequently run across people who have worked for me in the past—such as Rollin Sturgeon, the director; James Young, Constance Talmadge, Mary Charleson, Kate Price and others, including J. Barney Sherry and Hector Dion, my two first leading men years ago, when pictures were young."

"Wild Youth," according to Commodore Blackton, is the sort of picture that almost translates itself into screen terms. There was said to be little necessity of deletion, as it seems, made for motion picture reproduction.

Spoor Increases Publicity for MacLane

GEORGE K. SPOOR, who produced for release through the Kleine System in January "Men Who Have Made Love to Me," with Mary MacLane in the leading role, is planning an unusual quota of advertising and publicity matter to precede and accompany the subject, according to announcements this week.

This announcement advises that Mr. Spoor's publicity department has completed a special news matter sheet, said to be distinct from the customary four-page slip sheet that goes with all his ultra-features. This special sheet is to be sent out broadcast to newspapers and magazines, which received previous stories at various intervals, together with cuts and mats.

Miss MacLane was given a special showing of her picture in the studio projection room last week, and expressed herself as pleased and even surprised at the outcome of her efforts before the camera. She made the trip from New York especially to see the picture.

Mr. Spoor's "Ruggles of Red Gap," featuring Taylor Holmes, is now in the cutting room. Work is being finished on the sub-titling which will, no doubt, meet, if not excel, in artistry the quality of previous Ultra Features.

Billboard and poster advertising on this picturization of Harry Leon Wilson's Saturday Evening Post story is now being designed.

MacDonald Begins Triangle "Harmony Lad"

Director Frank Borsage of the Triangle Studios on the Coast, has been furnished with Wallace MacDonald for the leading role of "The Harmony Lad," it was announced last week.

Pauline Starke has the leading feminine role.

Second Feature of Petrova Is Named

Petrova's publicity director announced last week that the production following "Daughter of Destiny" on Madame Petrova's calendar has been named. "The Light Within" is the title given to the story, which is expected to be released shortly. It was scenarioized by Mrs. L. Case Russell from her original story called "Laurel Carlisle, M.D.," and directed by Larry Trimble.

Madame Olga Petrova, Star of Her Own Productions

Director Trimble, it is announced, has been given credit for naming the feature.

Ida May Park Directs New Bluebird

Ida May Park, it was announced last week from the Bluebird offices, is now in the first stages of her new production called "Her Fling," with Dorothy Phillips and William Stowell in the leading roles. It is said "Her Fling" shows Miss Phillips as a stenographer whose whole life changed after she met a banker. Stowell is the latter.

Headed by Miss Phillips and Mr. Stowell, the screen adaptation of Katherine Leiser Robbins' story has a cast composed of Juanita Hansen, Claire Du Brey, Joe Girard, Edward Cecil, George Chesebro, Sallie Starr and little Frankie Lee.

DeMille Progresses with Artcraft Feature

Production work on "The Whispering Chorus," which Cecil B. DeMille is directing at the Lasky studio in Hollywood, is said to be going along smoothly, with a cast including Kathlyn Williams, Raymond Hatton, Elliott Dexter and others. Photographic work is being done by Alvin Wyckoff.

An announcement from Artcraft last week declares that evidences of a master-touch will be found in every detail of the picture when it is completed. The story is described as modern, with compelling force and great appeal.

Wharton and Cooper Visit Ithaca

Leopold Wharton, of the Wharton Brothers, producers of Chief Flynn's secret service exposure of Imperial Germany's spy system in this country, "The Eagle's Eye" with Courtney Ryley Cooper, who is writing the scenario of the Chief's story, spent three days at the Wharton Studios, at Ithaca last week, assisting in making ready the first three episodes for the trade showing which will be made in a few days.

Leopold Wharton's activities in connection with this production so far have been confined to the filming of special scenes and locations in New York, Washington and other large cities, which has greatly expedited the progress of the production. The work at the studios has been directed by Theodore Wharton.

"Eagle's Eye" Is Shown to the Trade

It was announced last week that a trade showing of first episodes of "The Eagle's Eye," the serial photodrama produced by The Whartons, founded on the story by Chief Flynn, exposing the ramifications of Imperial Germany's spy system in America, will be given at the Strand theatre January 18, at 10 o'clock in the morning.

Invitations have been sent to all exhibitors, representatives of the trade and to state and city officials, judges of the courts, clergymen, heads of patriotic, defense and war service organizations and to military and naval officers detailed at this station.

Vitagraph Engages Expert Photographer

Albert E. Smith, president of Vitagraph, announces the engagement of Frank Bangs, the well known theatrical photographer, as consulting photographic expert, and of Henry Houry, of Paris, as technical adviser for the company's eastern studio. These two appointments, Mr. Smith declares, are part of his recently outlined plans for the expansion of Vitagraph in all branches of the production department.

Comedy Ingenue Transfers to Drama

Claire Anderson, ingenue with the Triangle-Keystone comedy forces, has deserted slap-stick for the drama, and is now cast with Triangle Director E. Mason Hopper in "The Answer," a drama written by E. Magnus Ingleton, which will be released as the seven-reel special feature on the February program.

Miss Anderson's last comedy appearance was with Director H. Edwards in Ray Griffith's picture, "His Double Life."

With the consolidation of the Triangle and Triangle-Keystone playing forces at Culver City, it is probable that the casting directors at the dramatic end of the lot will take advantage of the many new types made available by the removal of Keystone from Hollywood. Miss Anderson is the first of the comedy stars to be drafted for the regular program features.

Distribution Plan Approved

Hodkinson Reports Success of Plan to Use General Exhanges for Paralta Plays—Bookings Considered Satisfactory

SUCCESS and complete approval were reported this week by W. W. Hodkinson on his plan for using the exchange service of General Film for the physical handling of the Paralta Plays, which he is distributing.

It is now four weeks since the arrangement with General was completed, but the reports on bookings of the two Paralta Plays, "A Man's Man," with J. Warren Kerrigan, and "Madam Who" with Bessie Barriscale, are said to be as satisfactory from the viewpoint of salesmanship as could have been obtained in months by a new organization. In addition, the service to exhibitors of prints and supplies has gone forward without a hitch, through the channels furnished by the General Film exchanges.

It has been possible, Mr. Hodkinson states, to give the full value of his distribution service through the General exchanges. The control of prices is vested in the W. W. Hodkinson Corporation, and every contract is approved by its head office sales department before pictures are released under it. The Hodkinson principles of the distributor serving as the balancing factor between producer and exhibitor, and spreading the return on the pictures over a period of time sufficient both to give the producer a full return on his investment and the individual exhibitor a rental charge commensurate with his ability to pay, are becoming well known again throughout the trade.

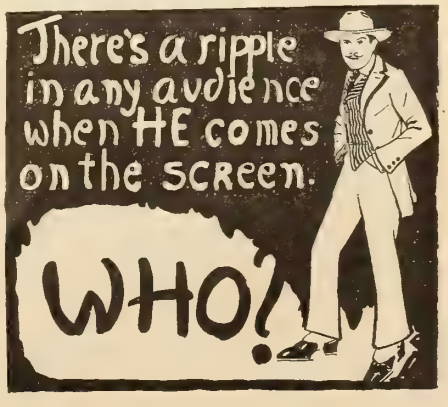
The sales department of the Hodkinson Corporation is now issuing a series of letters to the General Film sales forces setting forth the basic principles of the Hodkinson distribution plans, as supplementary to the three "Hodkinson Service" conventions which S. R. Kent, general sales manager of the General Film Company, has just held in New York, Chicago and San Francisco.

Backing up the definite work being done to open the lines of Hodkinson principles through the General Film exchanges to the exhibitor, the publicity and exhibitor service department of the W. W. Hodkinson Corporation has prepared an intensive exhibitor campaign. Direct-by-mail advertising of original but dignified form will be sent out, commencing next week, setting forth the Hodkinson principles and their application to the sale of the Paralta Pictures and other Hodkinson product.

Katterjohn Comments on Star

Declares That Players Must Have Compelling Story to Back Them Up—Thinks Construction of Story Is Supreme

MONTE M. KATTERJOHN, scenario editor of Paralta Plays, Inc., has put into a brief article his opinions of the star system, and the stories in which these players are presented on the screen.



Mr. Katterjohn says: "The star will always be a very necessary unit, but he or she must possess genuine star ability. Then there must be an interest-compelling story for that star—a story with drama, that entertains. I hold that a star-story can be just as big and compelling as any other kind of story. But story and star need each other.

"Then we must have more picture plays which stand on sheer story merit, unmindful of big names or a well known cast. We have had too few of them. Such stories will do more to retain, and perhaps re-establish the public's faith in motion pictures than any other immediately available remedy. The picture patron not of the pronounced 'fan' type desires and must have both the star-story and the big plot-and-drama story. The ratio should be about two star stories to every one of the other sort.

"But of supreme importance just now is the construction of any and all types of stories, and to which, in the past, the majority of producers have paid the very scantiest attention. We have had the last word in acting, ideal stories and perfect sets, wonderful photography and astounding direction. This applies to the minority of better pictures. All the while there has been vast room for improvement in motion story construction, commonly termed 'continuity,' and by critics, called 'technique.'

"Today we need specialization in continuity writing—not lifeless, mechanical, and meaningless scene arrangement. The pictured story should be so constructed that it will be easier to follow—more closely knit—more direct. The art cries for an improved technique.

"The advance has outdistanced most of those laborers who style themselves continuity writers. Where are better story and continuity writers to hail from, did you ask? Many are around us now, and others will come to us from the industry's allied arts, all yet to be developed, but only through a more decent treatment and consideration."

Distribution Managers Meet

Paramount-Artcraft Forces Addressed in New York by Brulatour and Graham, of London—Marks Adolph Zukor's Birthday.

WHAT Paramount-Artcraft officials characterize as one of the most enthusiastic get-to-gether meetings ever held by that organization was held at the New York headquarters of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation last week, at which the branch managers from all over the country attended.

The series of meetings was called for the purpose of discussing the distribution plans of the coming year in connection with the release of Paramount and Artcraft Pictures. At these conferences, it is announced, the reports from representatives in different localities throughout the country proved a most emphatic indication that the star series system of booking, inaugurated last summer, is a potent advancement.

Concluding the series of conferences, a dinner at the Astor to the visiting representatives, the executive committee and the department heads of the Famous Players-Lasky organization and its affiliated bodies, was given by Adolph Zukor. This occasion marked the forty-fifth birthday of Mr. Zukor and inasmuch as he did not know that his associates were aware of this fact, he was deeply moved and surprised when the executive board presented him with an immense silver loving cup. Jesse L. Lasky made a stirring presentation speech, after an appropriate introduction by Toastmaster Elek J. Ludvigh, and expressed the great sense of appreciation felt by those present of all Mr. Zukor means to those closely associated with him as well as the entire industry.

Wolper Arranges Mastercraft Details

F. Eugene Farnsworth, President of the Recently Formed Mastercraft Photoplay Corporation

ISAAC WOLPER, vice president and general manager of the newly formed Mastercraft Photo-Play Corporation, spent several days in New York last week arranging details for the new company, before leaving for their Eastern studios.

In speaking of the Mastercraft Company, Mr. Wolper said, "After spending a great deal of time and money in carefully investigating the motion picture industry, I am thoroughly convinced that there is ample room for a picture organization operating on purely business lines and making productions of exceptional magnitude. The men who are my associates in Mastercraft Photo-Play Corporation are men of not only sound financial standing, but men who have really achieved distinction in large business enterprises and who are now going to devote their entire energies to the development of this enterprise upon which we are launched. In all of our departments, strictly business principles will be followed out. It is our intention to make no less than four nor more than seven productions a year.

"In addition to our studios in Boston, which when completed, will cover over fifty acres of ground, we will also have large studios in California. F. Eugene Farnsworth, president of our company, is in California at the present time looking after these details and as soon as they are completed he will return to New York where we will arrange the final details for the filming of the first production."

George Forth Supplies Film "Props"

The motion picture has advanced to that stage, according to the latest developments surrounding the career of George Forth, screen player, where it is not bad form for the actor to supply some of the "props" needed in the filming of a story.

George Forth, Who Furnishes "Props" With His Acting

It is told that a Vitagraph director recently informed Forth a good part was awaiting the latter, but a certain sort of farm was needed before the work could progress. "What certain sort?" asked Forth. The director described the desired farm.

"Oh, I have that, too," said the player, as if talking of his wardrobe, "down in Maryland. I'll show you some photographs to-morrow. Won't you and the company be my guests?"

And so it came that the exterior scenes of "I Will Repay," featuring Corinne Griffith, were made on George Forth's farm.

Western Story Claims Williams' Time

According to reports from sunny California, Earle Williams and Grace Darmond, his leading woman, are now in the midst of their first Western production, an adaptation of one of the O. Henry stories. It is understood the players started work on January 2 under the direction of Tom Mills, and the picture is expected to be completed for release in March by Vitagraph.

Metro Plans to Produce "House of Mirth"

Metro this week announced that one of the most important productions it will make during the coming year will be "The House of Mirth," a screen version of Edith Wharton's novel, which was dramatized by the late Clyde Fitch and given a Broadway stage presentation. Emmy Wehlen will be starred in the role of Lily Bart, in the picturization of the story which has been made by June Mathis and Albert Capellani. Mr. Capellani will direct the production.

Walthall Picture Follows Barriscale

Following "A Man's Man," in which J. Warren Kerrigan is the star and "Madam Who?" with Bessie Barriscale in the stellar role, both of which are now showing throughout the country, Henry B. Walthall will make his debut as a Paralta star in "His Robe of Honor," written by Ethel and James Dorrance.

"Who Loved Him Best?" for Miss Goodrich

Edna Goodrich's next Mutual photoplay will be "Who Loved Him Best?" a five-reel production in which Miss Goodrich is cast as a motion picture star, and many of the scenes of which are laid in the Bohemian quarter of Washington Square, New York. It will be released February 4.

"Who Loved Him Best?" was produced under the working title of "Art and the Woman" at the Long Island studios of the Mutual Film Corporation under the direction of Dell Henderson.

Ruth Roland Tells of Pathe New Series

Ruth Roland, one of the stars in the series of eight two-reel dramas being released by Pathe under the title of "The Price of Folly," has been authorized by that company to speak of the nature of the pictures, through the Pathe publicity department. Frank Mayo is the other one-half of the starring combination.

Summed up, Miss Roland's statements announce that the most important problems of present day life are dealt with in the series.

Pathe announces that the entire series has been booked for a pre-release showing on the Marcus Loew Circuit of theatres. The release date for the series has been set for January 20.

Goldwyn Keeps Tom Moore

Tom Moore's special engagement with Goldwyn for the chief male role in "The Cinderella Man," with Mae Marsh, has lengthened into additional appearances in pictures made by that company, and he seems fairly settled there. In "Dodging a Million," with Mabel Normand, directed by George Loane Tucker, Moore was again cast, following the completion of which Goldwyn has announced its intention of using him in still another subject.

Edison Stars Miss Courtot

Considers "The Unbeliever" His Greatest Screen Feature—Star Has Part of Belgian Refugee—In Seven Reels.

THOMAS A. EDISON'S seven-reel production, "The Unbeliever," is characterized, in an announcement by the Edison company, as the greatest contribution to the screen of that organization. The picture stars Marguerite Courtot, who has the role of a Belgian refugee. Raymond McKee has the role opposite her.

In speaking of "The Unbeliever," the Edison company said: "Miss Courtot considered the peculiar requirements of her role and discussed them with her director, Alan Crosland. They agreed that such a part demands a convincing portrayal combined with a deep and delicate understanding, because the spirit it embodies is the very spirit of Belgium; and Belgium's cause is paramount in the welter of warfare to-day. The universal ideal that is woven about the martyrdom of Belgium exacts from its heroes and heroines an absolutely sincere expression and a subtle regard for its significance.

"The faithful delineation with which Miss Courtot lives her screen character is refreshing throughout the production. Entirely apart from her ability she has a personal equipment that few artists could have afforded and which Miss Courtot probably unconsciously brings into play as a highlight in characterization. Her direct descent from a proud French family, with a mother whose fine patriotism sternly regards the daughter who should have been a son of France, gives Miss Courtot an heritage which she never fails to take advantage of in "The Unbeliever." There is about her the fragrant innocence of sheltered youth and this is revealed in startling contrast to the brutal lust of a Prussian lieutenant. Raymond McKee plays the spirited young marine private who finally transplants the Belgian flower to the more fortunate sun of America, and Miss Courtot makes her inevitable surrender a victory of love and gratitude."

Keeney Production Starts Feb. 1st

JAMES KIRKWOOD, who has been engaged by Frank A. Keeney Pictures Corporation to direct Catherine Calvert and other prominent films stars, in a series of special productions, announces that he now is assembling for the cast and expects to have the production under way by the first of February. Mr. Keeney announces that negotiations have been completed for the leasing of one of the large studios in New York, which will be used by the Keeney Pictures Corporation, pending the erection of the new studio to be built exclusively for Keeney productions.

Miss Calvert will be the featured player of the first production. The story for the first production was written by Benjamin S. Kutler, formerly scenario editor for Augustus Thomas and Famous Plays and Players. He is the author of several screen successes. The title has not yet been chosen. Mr. Keeney is a newcomer in the producing field, but he is not new to the theatrical world. He is a prominent theatre owner and has a wide knowledge of showmanship. In regard to future plans of the company Mr. Keeney said:

"I intend to engage other stars and shall select them as I selected Miss Calvert, on a basis of youth, beauty and dramatic ability. I shall not engage actors or actresses who have become famous in other lines of the profession, but are unable to make good in pictures. I believe the public likes names, but does not care for names which carry no merit in the specific line of entertainment with which they are affiliated.

Vitagraph Comedians Make Three

News from the center of Vitagraph activities on the West Coast infers that directors and comedians of that company are busy night and day on three new comedies, "Telephones and Troubles," "Courts and Convicts" and "Rooms and Rumors."

The directors include J. A. Howe and Larry Semon.

Alice Brady Finishes Subject

"The Knife" Now Being Cut and Titled, While Star Rests Before Starting New Select Picture—Release Shortly

PRODUCTION work on "The Knife," it was announced this week by Select Pictures, has been practically completed, and the film is now being cut and titled preparatory to release shortly. The production stars Alice Brady.

In announcing the completion of "The Knife," Select Pictures said: "The play is another of Eugene Walter's successes and was used as the attraction for the opening of the New Bijou theatre last season. As an offering on the legitimate stage it was a hit and in the screen version, which has been made by Charles Maigne, "The Knife" most certainly lives up to all previous standards.

"The story deals with the life of a young southern girl who falls into the hands of a gang of white slavers. It is a melodrama and gives Miss Brady a role at once forceful and singularly appealing. In the cast she is supported by Frank Morgan, her leading man; Craufurd Kent, Helen Lackaye, Paul Doucet, Alice Hollister, Jonnie Walker and Frank Evans.

"A distinctive feature of the screen play will be the lovely southern settings it contains. These were obtained on the Emerson plantation located a few miles from Jacksonville, Florida, where Miss Brady with her director, Robert G. Vignola and her company spent a couple of weeks.

"With 'The Knife' completed, Miss Brady is planning to take a short breathing spell before commencing work on the next of her Select productions. She has now finished three of her Select Star Series, 'Her Silent Sacrifice' and 'Woman and Wife' being the two previous releases, and all three pictures are distributed by Select Pictures Corporation."

Jesse L. Lasky Leaves for California

JESSE L. LASKY, vice-president of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, left New York last week for California, following the conclusion of a series of meetings held in New York at which all Paramount-Artcraft Exchanges were represented.

Just prior to his departure from New York, Mr. Lasky expressed enthusiasm over the manner in which all the work in the various studios is progressing. "With the beginning of the new year," said Mr. Lasky, "I have no hesitation in saying that personally I can see only success of the most flattering character ahead. Present day conditions demand that we extend greater efforts than ever in our endeavor to cheer the nation. In fact, we have already commenced work on the erection of additions to the laboratories and working space. For the last year, in order to handle the total number of prints of Paramount and Artcraft pictures made at the Lasky Studios alone, the laboratory has been running two shifts, handling approximately 600,000 feet of positive each day. Two years ago, when the laboratory was built, it had a capacity of double the number of Paramount releases then required. With the completion of our new additions we will be able to take care of the greater demands made on our producing forces.

"Our production plans for the coming year indicate that the general merit of our offerings will far exceed even our present high standard."

Madeline Traverse in Ivan Productions

IVAN FILM PRODUCTIONS, through its publicity department, last week declared that Madeline Traverse, in the super-photoplay, "Sins of Ambition," is given ample sway for pre-eminent artistry.

The announcement said: "Her role calls upon the portrayal of two opposite characteristics of human nature—the one demanding that emotional ability is an actress that can sway crowds of people to do one's bidding, the other that majestic repose which always inspires respect when evidenced before a critical audience.

"Madeline Traverse, as the wealthy philanthropist, using her position in society to dare espouse the cause of the more unfortunate, is excellent in the manner in which she handles the situation. It is more than acting that one sees when beholding Madeline Traverse entering the scene of The Grand Bazaar. One is immediately impressed with the grandeur of her bearing; "as born to the purple"—an expression which is hardly safe to use in these democratic days except in strictly poetic license.

"Prunella" Started for Paramount

Work has begun, it was announced this week by Famous Players-Lasky, on the Paramount production of "Prunella," with Marguerite Clark in the star role.

In this picture Miss Clark is said to have a part that is in striking contrast to that in her last picture, "The Seven Swans."

Berman Writes Home Office

Harry M. Berman, sales manager of Jewel Productions, Inc., who is making a transcontinental tour in search of first-hand information as to national trade conditions, writes his home office from St. Louis, that he sees "no immediate reason to worry over the prospects for the coming year."

Constance Talmadge Is Making "The Shuttle" In California for Select

"Woman in Web" Moves Along Nicely

Reports from the Western studio of the Vitagraph Company which President Albert E. Smith, of Vitagraph, announced this week he had received, advise that production of the new serial, "The Woman in the Web," is moving along nicely and rapidly. The first scenes, of an ambassador's ball at Washington, were made in two days. Following this the action moved to exteriors showing a reproduction of the imperial gardens in Petrograd, with David Smith directing.

Starred in "The Woman in the Web" are Hedda Nova and Frank Glendon, and large casts are being used in their support.

The story is said to involve a world pursuit, which takes the principal players to every country, nearly, in the world, but the greater part of the action takes place in the United States.

"Home Trail" Blue Ribbon

William Wolbert, director of Vitagraph productions, is planning to take his company, featuring Nell Shipman and Alfred Whitman, to the Mojave desert for several "shots" in "The Home Trail," a drama of the West. The picture will be a Blue Ribbon Feature, Vitagraph has announced, and the desert scenes will probably keep the company there two weeks.

Clara Kimball Young in Accident

Clara Kimball Young, the Select Pictures star, had a narrow escape from death one morning last week when the automobile in which she was riding collided with a street car at Ninetieth street and Broadway. She was unhurt.

Rothacker Studio Visited by Many

Among the recent visitors at the Rothacker Laboratory-Studio, Chicago, were Edgar Lewis, the director; Mr. Graham of the Petrova Pictures Corporation, and A. I. Smith, the producer of Alaska pictures.

Tiry Miller of the Camera Department of the Rothacker organization, has returned from an extensive stay in Pennsylvania where he was producing a multiple-reel industrial subject.

Wesley Smith, formerly of the Camera Department of the Rothacker organization, has been promoted to an important position in the factory organization.

Frank J. Snyder, formerly a member of Doc. Willats' technical staff, has arrived in Chicago from New York to join the Rothacker organization.

Jack Byrne of the Production Department is now engaged in directing several important industrial subjects involving studio work.

N. J. Baumer, studio manager, is fast recovering from a serious attack of tonsilitis which confined him to his home for several weeks.

Watterson R. Rothacker expects to be in New York at the Hotel Biltmore from January 12 until about January 18, and from New York will go to Washington before returning to Chicago.

Ed. Blackburn, well known in film circles, has been added to the sales force of the Rothacker organization.

Fred. Wright Mentions Production Costs

Apropos of the present high cost of film production, Frederick E. Wright, who is now at work at the Astra Studio directing Pathe Plays, mentions one instance of comparative costs that show an 18,000 per cent increase.

Some few years ago Mr. Wright directed a Pathe picture called "Old Fogy." This was one of the first five-reel subjects made, but was released as a three-reel feature because at that ime it was not thought that the public wanted five-reel subjects. Part of the business in the story called for circus views, and to secure these shots, Mr. Wright spent four days en tour with the Frank Robbins show.

Peggy Hyland Prepares for Fox Film

Peggy Hyland, the film star whom William Fox recently placed under contract, is preparing for her initial picture under the Fox standard, it was announced last week.

Miss Hyland's subjects are to be Fox Special Features, it is said.

A Detail Study In Benjamin Chapin's "A Son of Democracy" for Release by Paramount In a Series of Ten Two-Reel Dramas

"Entertain to Educate," Says Chapin

BENJAMIN CHAPIN, who wrote, produced and directed "The Son of Democracy," the series of ten two-reel dramas of early American life that is to be released through Paramount, beginning February 11, is firmly of the opinion that to educate the public, in the showman sense of the word, the public must likewise be entertained.

In this connection Mr. Chapin said: "No man ever has made a success who has set out deliberately to 'educate' and only to educate the public, for the latter refuses to take its education undiluted. If you would be an instructor, you must first be entertaining. Our best history teachers are those who fill their history with human interest, who are entertainers as well as teachers.

"When I began five years ago to prepare for the screen these stories—in which Abraham Lincoln is a leading character—I made up my mind that they should be 'good shows.' I worked to entertain and amuse, for I knew that the Lincoln atmosphere, the educational side, would be more powerful if it did not so dominate the stories that they became typical 'educationals.'"

The entire series is the story of the building of America and Americans, an epic of democracy, showing freedom in the making. The leading characters are Abraham Lincoln, his father, Tom Lincoln, who could neither read nor write, and Tom's father Abraham, friend of Daniel Boone, and who was killed in a fight with Indians. Benjamin Chapin plays Abraham Lincoln, as a young man and as the President, Tom Lincoln, and the grandfather. Abraham Lincoln, the boy, and his rough and ready playmates, are portrayed by a cast of boy actors.

Frohman Feature Ready for a Showing

TEN o'clock in the morning of January 17 has been set by the Frohman Amusement Corporation as the hour for showing, at the Rivoli theatre in New York, the picture starring Arnold Daly, "My Own United States." The presentation is a pre-release one, for the trade.

It is claimed that considerable of the thrilling part of the production has been enacted aboard the old U. S. S. frigate Constitution, and also, with permission of the War Department, the Frohman Amusement Corporation has been permitted to use a great number of troops and marines in the several battles.

Prominent among the characters portrayed in "My Own United States" are the pre-eminent heroes of military and civilian life recorded in America's history.

Supporting Arnold Daly in his leading role of Lieut. Philip Nolan, are associated as leading lady, Anna Lehr in the role of Agnes Churchill; Charles E. Graham as Aaron Burr, Duncan McRae as Alexander Hamilton, Roy Applegate as George Washington, P. R. Scammon as Thomas Jefferson, Frank Murray as Gen. U. S. Grant, Jerald Day as Abraham Lincoln, F. C. Earle as Andrew Jackson, Edward Dunn as General Wilkinson, Joseph Levering as Col. George Morgan, Thomas Donnelly as General Churchill, Claude Cooper as William Bayard, William Miller as Van Ness, Frederick Truesdale as Mr. Pendleton, Marie DuChette as Natalie Sommers, Helen Mulholland as Theodosia Burr, Frederick Herzog as Admiral Stephen Decatur, Sydney Bracey as Capt. Gene Gautier, Mrs. Allen Walker as Mrs. Nolan, Mrs. Mary Kennison Carr as Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, R. Wongeman as Dr. Hossack and Jack Hamilton as Lieut. Gaines, all of which characters are associated with this country's history.

Pathe Plays Every Two Weeks

Overproduction in Industry Is Given as Cause for Decreasing Output, but Increasing Quality—Start January 27.

OVERPRODUCTION in the motion picture industry was given this week by the Pathe Exchange, Inc., as its reason for the announcement that beginning January 27 Pathe Plays will be released one every two weeks instead of one each week. With this policy in practice Pathe intends, it is made known, to elevate the quality, which it believes, under present circumstances, is better for the industry than quantity.

The first four Pathe Plays under this plan, and their release dates are announced by Pathe as follows: "Innocent," with Fannie Ward, on January 27; Frank Keenan in "Loaded Dice," February 10; "Kidder and Ko," with Bryant Washburn, February 24, and Bessie Love in "Spring of the Year," March 10.

"The Pathe idea in accordance with which our vice-president and general manager, J. A. Berst, is now on the Coast," said F. C. Quimby, sales manager, concerning the bi-weekly plan with alternating stars, "is, in a nutshell, 'highest class production with the advantages of the star system and without its evils.' Pathe believes that it has been the extravagant overuse of the star idea that has brought the terrific increase in rental prices. We know also that stars are necessary at the present time, and we think that our policy of twenty-six quality features a year will meet with favor. The tendency in the business must be to better and fewer features and longer runs. It is in line with this thought that we are acting with all the resources of Pathe behind us.

Bryant Washburn and His Better Half, Inhaling the Ozone of California, Where the Star Is Appearing in Pathe Productions

"We want to see the motion picture business go ahead, and we know that there are too many pictures being produced today. We could very easily have gone ahead on the one-a-week basis such as most companies are aiming at, and we would have made good pictures, but we are not taking any chances on a let-up in quality. We know we can produce twenty-six features a year that are up to the standard set by 'Innocent' and 'Loaded Dice,' therefore our decision to release one of the Pathe Plays every two weeks alternating the stars."

"Les Miserables" Released February 10

"LES MISERABLES," the William Fox de luxe production, will be released to exhibitors on February 10. Announcement to this effect was made by William Fox this week.

The production closed a run of five weeks at the Lyric theatre in New York on January 12 to make way for a two-week showing of "Cheating the Public," the Fox 1918 cinemelodrama, which is the second of the series beginning with "The Honor System." "Cheating the Public" is to be released January 20, and it was desired to have its drawing power thoroughly demonstrated by at least one week's New York showing prior to the picture's release.

Reports from the Fox Film Corporation offices are to the effect that "Les Miserables" did satisfactory business during practically the entire time it was being shown at the Lyric. During the holiday season it pulled especially well. Top prices of $1 were obtained.

The photodrama, which follows the Dumas novel of the same name, has generally been declared by critics of the New York press and of the trade magazines to be the best dramatic work that William Farnum has done. His cast includes Jewel Carmen, Madame Sonia Markova and others of the Fox forces. Cutting of the production for release purposes is now under way. As shown at the Lyric, it ran upward of 9,700 feet and it is to be reduced to 8,000 feet. As it stood when completed by Director Frank Lloyd, it was about 13,000 feet.

Fox Names February Specials

Among the Stars Will Be George Walsh, Gladys Brockwell, Jewel Carmen and Tom Mix—"Jack Spurlock" First

WILLIAM FOX last week announced, through his publicity department, his Special Features releases for the month of February. George Walsh, Gladys Brockwell, Jewel Carmen and Tom Mix are the stars who will carry the main roles.

The first release, it is announced, will be the "Jack Spurlock-Prodigal" production which George Walsh has completed under the direction of Carl Harbaugh. This is down for February 3 and is the picture which the Fox management is advertising as a big extra-special production, made exclusively for those who have contracts for Fox Special Features. The story is taken from the book of the same name written by George Horace Lorimer, editor of The Saturday Evening Post, and the claim is made that more was paid for it than for any other story purchased by Mr. Fox during 1917.

"The Moral Law," starring Gladys Brockwell, to be released February 10, shows the star in a double role. The two characters are half-sisters of very different dispositions. Most of the scenes are laid in South America. The picture is being made under the direction of Bertram Bracken.

Jewel Carmen's second picture as a star will be entitled "The Girl with the Champagne Eyes" and will be released February 17. The story is that of a girl who drifts into a life of lawlessness and is reformed through the influence of a man on whom she had brought trouble in her own efforts to escape arrest. C. M. Franklin is directing the production.

The February 24 release will be a Tom Mix picture, "Sixshooter Andy," which is being made under the direction of S. A. Franklin. The cast, which is reported to be an exceptionally strong one, includes Enid Markey, Georgie Stone, Buddy Messinger, Lewis Sargent, Virginia Lee Corbin, Violet Radcliffe, Marie Messinger, Bert Woodruff, Sam Degrass, Charles Stevens, Patrick Crysman, Robert Fleming and others. The story deals with life in a wide-open Western town where the sheriff is in league with the lawless element and principally involves a young man and young woman.

Fox Opens New Picture at Lyric

William Fox's newest production to be released as a Standard Picture, January 20, under the title of "Cheating the Public," opened a two week's run at the Lyric theatre in New York on January 13.

It is the second of Director Richard Stanton's productions to be shown in the Broadway district, "The Spy" having been the first. The other, like "Cheating the Public," was a melodrama, but differs from the new production in being more largely propaganda. There is propaganda material, and much of it, in the new play, but this is overshadowed by the melodramatic features, of which there are ten especially emphasized by the producer.

The cast includes Ralph Lewis, Bertram Grassby, Tom Wilson, Charles Edler, Enid Markey, Wanda Petit, Fanny Migsley, Frankie Lee, Barbara Conley, Carrie Clark Ward, James Titus, Henry Peal, Edward Peil, Joseph Hartley, James Morgan, Arthur Glynn and Miles McCormack.

In addition to this feature during that week, Mutual also schedules a Strand Comedy and the Mutual Weekly.

"In Bad," which is described by Mutual as "typically Russellistic," was produced under the direction of Edward Sloman, who is understood to know the Russell temperament thoroughly. The picture shows Russell as Monty, the impetuous nephew of a society woman. Unshackled by conventions and with a decided leaning toward the art of fisticuffs, he engages an ex-pugilist with cauliflower ears to help keep his blood in circulation and shock the effete society set. A boxing-bout results in Monty being knocked over the balustrade on the second floor of his home and landing in the hall below at the feet of the girl whom his aunt wants him to marry, but who is disgusted with him.

In the cast is Francelia Billington, who has appeared opposite Russell in all American-Mutual productions; "Bull" Montana, an ex-pugilist and wrestler, and Carl Stockdale.

"Their Little Kid" is the title of the Strand comedy, featuring Billie Rhodes, scheduled for release January 22.

Exhibitors are said by Mutual to be enthusiastic over the features of the Mutual Weekly. In the Weekly of January 6 were shown some pictures of the European battle fields, portraying graphically the work of the French engineers in restoring the territory reconquered in the battle of the Aisne. The Weekly of January 21 will keep in touch with significant topics of the day and maintain the high standard established, it is promised by Mutual.

Jaxon-General Calls New Serial "Beat"

IN completing the opening episodes of "A Daughter of Uncle Sam" in time for the release of the first chapter to exhibitors January 19, the Jaxon Film Corporation, in an announcement through General Film this week, claims to have scored a "beat" in this line.

This belief arises, Jaxon-General insists, because a number of producers have been working on serials with spy plots, with the evident intention of bringing them out as early in the new year as possible. In its announcement General Film advises exhibitors that it is the intention of General to have "A Daughter of Uncle Sam" well under way on the screens of the country before other spy serials can be placed with exhibitors.

In describing the new serial, General Film said: "Though there is a red-blooded strain of romance to be found throughout, the twelve chapters of 'A Daughter of Uncle Sam' abound in thrilling action and encounters which have resulted from conflicts between American patriots and German secret agents who have been striving to interfere with Uncle Sam's war machine. Many of the dramatic incidents filmed in connection with the foiling of spies and plotters will visualize for the first time the true, inside stories of how this country's enemies have been balked by alert officials and volunteer aides. Jane Vance as the heroine and William Sorelle as the hero, promise a splendid interpretation of their appealing roles.

"Exhibitors have been quick to note the advantage of time, and General Film has been flooded with inquiries and bookings from theatres that wish to begin showing the spy plot serial at a time when revelations are still fresh in the memory of Americans."

Auto Runs Amuck in Miss Young's Studio

During the filming last week of a couple of scenes in "The House of Glass," the new production which Clara Kimball Young with her own company is making in her New Rochelle studio for Select Pictures, it became necessary to bring an automobile into the building for use in one of them. When it came time to haul Miss Young's limousine into the building, the men at the rope found they had an exceedingly difficult task, owing to slippery surfaces. Ashes were sprinkled about plentifully and a fresh start was made. About midday up the incline one of the workers stepped on an uncovered surface of ice and his fall dragged down his helpers. In a struggling mass men and car shot down the runway and charged the throng of interested spectators gathered about. For once, however, the innocent bystander was overlooked by Fate, but the car and the man who slipped were sent to the hospital, the one with a shattered crank case and the other with a broken arm.

"The Menace" Released January 21

Albert E. Smith, president of Vitagraph, announced this week that "The Menace," featuring Corinne Griffith with Evart Overton, will be the Blue Ribbon feature for the week of January 21.

It was directed by John Robertson, who now has Miss Griffith and Webster Campbell under his direction in the picture which Vitagraph is making for the State Defense Council of New York in which Governor Whitman and others will appear.

In "The Menace," the Vitagraph president declares refined melodrama is brought to the screen in its very best form. The story is said to be exceptionally well woven and designed to hold suspense until the very end of the production. The theme deals with a supposed hereditary taint, a leaning toward crime in a young man, and a girl's loyalty to the youth who does not know himself.

Detroit Theatre Books O. Henry Films

What General Film Company considers an exceptionally important booking for the O. Henry series which it releases is the center of an announcement made this week by that company concerning the booking by the Washington theatre in Detroit of all the two-reel Broadway Star Features produced during this year.

Exhibitor William Elliott, of the Washington, is said to have declared the O. Henry pictures have as much punch as, if not more than, some five-reel pictures.

Chaplin Gives Stag Party to Friends

Charlie Chaplin, with the assistance of the heads of departments of his producing organization, ushered the old year out with a banquet at the Alexandria Hotel in Hollywood. There were ten in the comedian's party, and it was a stag affair.

Those present, besides Chaplin, were Charles Reisner, John Jasper, Charles Lapsworth, Melville Brown, Roland Totheroh, Frank Crompton, Henry Bergman, Albert Austin and Carlyle R. Robinson.

Arbuckle Weaves Comedy About Indian

From the West Coast comes the announcement this week that Roscoe "Fatty" Arbuckle has been "absorbing" true Western atmosphere for his forthcoming Paramount laugh-maker, "Out West," which is described by the publicity department as a two-reel laugh which emanates from the wildest and woolliest portions of the wild and woolly west. It is claimed there is very little about the American Red Man that Arbuckle has not learned in the past few weeks, and all this knowledge he aims to use in "Out West."

As usual, Buster Keaton and Al. St. John will have a congenial place in the star's "affections" during the filming and screening of the picture.

Bluebirds Are Ready to April

Schedule Provides for Two Appearances of All Stars in Organization—First in February Is Carmel Myers Feature

With the tide low and the thermometer high, Franklyn Farnum and Juanita Hanson, Bluebird stars, enjoy a few minutes by the seaside

DEFINITE arrangements for the Bluebird program, as announced this week, carry the schedule into the middle of April and provide for two appearances of nearly every star in Bluebird's constellation within that period. Carmel Myers, in "The Wife He Bought," with Kenneth Harlan featured as her leading man, February 4, and Monroe Salisbury and Ruth Clifford, in "Hungry Eyes," February 11, have already been referred to in detail.

Mae Murray will make her third appearance as a Bluebird star, week starting February 18, offering H. Sheridan Bickers' story, "The Eternal Columbine," prepared for the screen and directed by Robert Leonard. Miss Murray is again scheduled for March 25 to be seen in Mr. Leonard's production of "The Eleventh Commandment," a story by F. McGrew Willis.

"Breeze Bolton Blows In," starring Franklyn Farnum, will be the Bluebird for February 25, with Juanita Hansen and Fred Montague featured in the support. Joseph F. Poland furnished the story and Joseph De Grasse, who has lately directed all of Mr. Farnum's features, made the production. Charles A. Kenyon, the author of "Kindling," furnished the scenario.

Features starring Carmel Myers will be offered March 4 and April 8, titles being "The Green Seal," and "Bona."

Two features presenting Monroe Salisbury and Ruth Clifford will be forthcoming on March 4 and April 15, both following the type of scenic "Westerns" that have made these stars distinctive. Rupert Julian directed "The Highest Card" and plays an essential role in Elliott J. Clawson's story. "The Heart of the Desert" will be credited to Mr. Salisbury and Miss Clifford's new director, Wilfred Lucas, who created the April 15 Bluebird from a story by Honore Willsie, editor of the Delineator.

Dorothy Phillips will present "Her Fling" as the feature for March 28, with William Stowell featured as her leading man. Ida May Park prepared her own scenario and directed Miss Phillips in Katherine Leiser Robbins' magazine story. Juanita Hansen, George Chesebro, Joseph Girard, Edward Cecil, Claire Du Brey and Sallie Starr will have supporting roles.

Universal Schedule Is Complete to May

FIVE-REELERS to supply exhibitors of Universal's product for the next three months have been scheduled by President and Director General Carl Laemmle of the organization, presenting all of the stars that have lately come into prominence under Universal's auspices. Under the new arrangement, there is no program designation for these attractions, each carrying either the name of the star or the producer as the advertising feature of the individual offering. The releases for February have previously been referred to in detail.

March 11—Ella Hall and Emory Johnson, in "Donna Perfecta," adapted by Elliott J. Clawson from the book by H. Perez Galdos, and produced by Elsie Jane Wilson. Prominent parts will be sustained by Ruby La Fayette, Gretchen Lederer, Winter Hall, Maxfield Stanley and Harry Holden.

March 18—"Back to the Right Trail," a Harry Carey production, by Jack Ford, with Molly Malone and Vesta Pegg featured in the support.

March 25—Louise Lovely, in "The Quest of Joan." The story was directed by Edgar Jones. Philo McCullough heads the supporting company.

April 1—"Little Miss Sherlock" will be a Little Zoe Rae feature directed by Rea Berger. Claire Du Brey, Charles Hill Mailes and William Carroll will have prominent supporting roles.

April 6—An Ella Hall production, featuring Emory Johnson, in a screen version of Lois Zellner's story, "Lady Eldon's Daughter," prepared by Doris Schroeder.

April 15—A Harry Carey feature, produced by Jack Ford, from Owen Wister's story, "Lin McLean," by the author of "The Virginian." Molly Malone will be featured in support of Harry Carey, with Vesta Pegg in an essential role.

April 22—"New Clothes" will be a Louise Lovely production, directed by Edgar Jones. Harvey Gates wrote the story and E. B. Lewis provided the scenario. Philo McCullough will be Miss Lovely's leading man, with Edna Maison and Winter Hall in prominent roles.

New Mae Marsh Film Released

Goldwyn's "Fields of Honor" Follows "Thais," and Normand and Kennedy Features are to Come Before February 10

"FIELDS OF HONOR," produced by Goldwyn Pictures Corporation, with Mae Marsh as the star, marked the release on January 14 of that company, following the launching of the Mary Garden production of "Thais." Incidentally, the company plans to follow this newest feature with another on January 28, starring Mabel Normand, and still another on February 10, with Madge Kennedy in the stellar part.

The January 14 release is said by Goldwyn to be a screen play that calls upon Miss Marsh for great fulness of emotional expression. It was made from the story by Irvin S. Cobb, and sets forth the trials and triumphs of a French girl who comes to America with her brother, her sister and her sister's Teutonic lover, just before the war. In the cast are Vernon Steele, who appeared with Miss Marsh in "Polly of the Circus," and Marguerite Marsh, who has likewise appeared in previous Goldwyn pictures. Ralph Ince directed this newest Goldwyn feature.

Mabel Normand's production, January 28, is called "Dodging a Million," by Edgar Selwyn and A. M. Kennedy, and is said to present the star in silks and satins.

The last of the Goldwyn trio, on February 10, is Madge Kennedy, who has appeared in "Baby Mine" and "Nearly Married." As a contrast to the drama, shadowed by war, which is told in "Fields of Honor," and the mixture of comedy, mystery and thrills provided in "Dodging a Million," the newest vehicle for Miss Kennedy will be "Our Little Wife." It revolves about the perplexities of a bride who takes her three rejected lovers on her honeymoon and discovers that she has a violent and jealous husband who doesn't relish the consequent situations in the least. To the comedy of the initial situation is thus added possibilities of wrecked happiness which make the whole story swing back and forth between contrasts of farce and genuine drama. Edward Dillon, formerly with D. W. Griffith's Coast staff, directs "Our Little Wife." In the cast are Marguerite Marsh, George Forth, Walter Hiers, Kempton Greene and Wm. B. Davidson.

"Innocent" Leads Pathe List January 27

FANNIE WARD in the first of the Pathe Plays, "Innocent," and Ruth Roland in a two-reel drama from "The Price of Folly" series, are outstanding features of Pathe's program for the week of January 27.

"Innocent" marks the first release under Pathe's new two-a-month policy announced this week. It is taken from A. H. Woods' stage play of the same name, and was produced under the direction of George Fitzmaurice.

Doris Kenyon appears in the tenth episode of "The Hidden Hand," entitled "Cogs of Death," with Sheldon Lewis, Arline Pretty and Mahlon Hamilton.

Ruth Roland is starred in "Counterfeit Clues," the second of the series of two-reel dramas. "The Price of Folly," with Frank Mayo.

The sixth release of the Argus Pictorial contains three "animated articles." The first is "Copying Nature's Handiwork," showing how models of delicate, tiny creatures are made for exhibition in Natural History Museums. The work is done by a Japanese artist, and among the examples of microscopic animal life seen are sea horses, tiny animals which when dried and pulverized are highly esteemed by the Japanese as medicine believed to cure all kinds of ailments.

Another article is devoted to laboratory experiments in the forces known as cohesion and adhesion, and, bringing this down to everyday terms, the reason for spouts on pitchers is shown.

"Our National Parks"—Rainier Park—a one-reel Pathe colored combitone scenic, shows the glaciers which, like the frozen tentacles of an octopus, steal slowly down from the snow-covered summit of Mount Rainier.

An International cartoon and educational split reel and Hearst-Pathe News No. 10 and No. 11 complete the program.

Vitagraph Releases More "Favorites"

ANOTHER list of names of present day stars and former stars appears in the Favorite Film Features programs announced by Vitagraph for the weeks of January 28 and February 4. Edith Storey, Clara Kimball Young, "Mother" Mary Maurice, John Bunny and numerous others are included in casts of the four pictures selected from the Vitagraph library, the programs being as follows:

January 28—"Children of the Feud," two-reel drama, featuring Edith Storey with James Morrison, Ned Finley, Harry Northrup, Arthur Ashley and others; "Getting up a Practice," one-reel comedy, featuring Clara Kimball Young, Maurice Costello, James Morrison, Hughie Mack, and George Cooper.

February 4—"The Pirates," two-reel comedy, featuring Clara Kimdball Young, John Bunny, Robert Gaillard, Anders Randolph and others; "The Wings of a Moth," one-reel drama, featuring Florence Turner, Mary Maurice and L. Rogers Lytton.

Favorite Film Features were put on the market by Vitagraph about seven months ago and it is declared by the company that they are growing in popularity every week. Many of them are pictures which, a few years ago, were ranked among the best in the field.

The features are issued in three reels each week, two of which are drama, and one comedy, or vice versa.

Select Closes a Contract in Los Banos

WHAT Select Pictures declares a remarkable instance of the recognition of a small-town exhibitor of the value of high-grade pictures is cited by that company in a contract which it insists is in many respects one of the most noteworthy that has been closed in some time between distributor and exhibitor. The contract calls for Select Pictures in Los Banos, Cal., a village of 745 persons.

The exhibitor is Charles Guintini, and his theatre is the Crescent.

The contract which Mr. Guintini has given Select Pictures stipulates for the showing at the Crescent theatre of all pictures produced by Clara Kimball Young, Norma Talmadge, Constance Talmadge and Alice Brady during the year of 1918. This embodies the four Select Star Series of pictures.

Mr. Guintini, at the time of signing his contract, gave a play-date for each new productiou covering every other week in the year, so that the Select output is contracted for and play dates given for the entire year's output at the very beginning of the contract. Mr. Guintini handed a memorandum as follows to H. H. Hicks, Select's San Francisco branch manager, at the time of closing the contract.

"I wish to start the first Select Picture on Monday, December 31, 1917, and to show a new Select Picture every other Monday during 1918. I would like to start first with Norma Talmadge in "The Secret of the Storm Country"; but if this is not possible I will start with any other Select Picture."

Edith Storey Presented in Dual Role

In the forthcoming Metro picture, "The Eyes of Mystery," in which Edith Storey will make her debut as a Metro star, she will be presented as both mother and daughter, first in crinolines and powdered hair and later in the mode of the present moment.

June Mathis prepared the story for the screen from a novel. Tod Browning directed.

"Next!" for General's Lady-Barber Shop

For release on January 19 in the comedy line, General Film has announced an Essanay one-reel subject, called "Next!" in which many attractive girls are said to be the center of attraction as "operators" in the barber shop. Director Hotaling conceived the picture.

Essanay's scenic release for the same date is "Water Powers of Eastern Canada."

Artcraft Completes "Blue Bird"

The Famous Players-Lasky production of "The Blue Bird," which will be released by Artcraft, has been completed, according to latest announcements. Trick photography, it is said, plays an important part in the picture.

Irwin Plans "Over the Top" Campaign

WALTER W. IRWIN, general manager of Vitagraph's distributing organization, announced this week that he is planning what he expects to be, for "Over the Top," the patriotic feature with Sergeant Guy Empey, one of the broadest advertising campaigns ever conducted in connection with a motion picture.

Last week Mr. Irwin called a conference of his chief aides in the Vitagraph selling organization from various parts of the United States and Canada to discuss the campaign on the Empey picture and other important features which the company has in preparation. The conference brought A. W. Goff, assistant general manager; E. Auger, Eastern division manager; H. D. Naugle, Western division manager, and the advertising, publicity and sales promotion departments to the home office for a series of meetings to discuss definite methods and expenditures to be employed.

In addition to mapping out plans for "Over the Top," Mr. Irwin and his lieutenants laid out campaigns for the exploitation of the patriotic feature which Vitagraph is making with the cooperation of the New York State Defense Council, and in which Governor Whitman and the leading New York State officials will appear, and for "The Woman in the Web," the next fifteen-episode serial which Vitagraph is to release following "Vengeance —and the Woman." Each of these productions, it is announced, will be backed by campaigns which will take in the United States and Canada.

In the case of "Over the Top," Mr. Irwin, it is announced, has completed arrangements whereby there will be a concerted drive from four different angles. For the benefit of exhibitors, Mr. Irwin calls attention to the fact that, in addition to the advertising which will be done by Vitagraph, there will be combined efforts put forth on the part of G. P. Putnam's Sons, publishers of Empey's book, "Over the Top," the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, which is running Empey's stories in newspapers, and will run "Over the Top" as serial about the time the picture is finished; and Lee Kedig, manager of Empey's lecture tour.

Bernhardt Comments on Goldwyn's "Thais"

Sarah Bernhardt, the French actress, was said to have been greatly impressed with Mary Garden's performance in the Goldwyn production of "Thais" when the picture was shown at the Strand in New York the first week of the new year. She characterized the production, including both the work of the singer and the director, as "superb," it is said.

Original "Patria" Cast Used Again

The five-part Pathe play, "The Mysterious Client," with Irene Castle in the star role, will have the original cast that appeared with Mrs. Castle in "Patria," it was announced last week by Pathe. Milton Sills and Warner Oland are the male leads and Fred Wright is the director.

Laemmle Gets X-Ray Pictures

Universal Declares They Are First Motion Pictures Made Under that Instrument—Released on January 25

THE Universal Film Company this week announced, through President Carl Laemmle, that it has secured X-ray pictures showing the bones and joints of the human body in actual motion. These are, Universal declares, the very first motion pictures made under that instrument, and are expected to have an immediate value in rebuilding war-shattered soldiers.

The pictures obtained are said by Universal to be rich in technical value, and expects them to be of more than passing interest to the public, as they are considered a novelty and quite in line with the educational subjects being shown in the Universal Screen Magazine.

The first of the X-ray pictures are scheduled in the Magazine release No. 55, on January 25.

Concerning X-ray pictures, President Laemmle said: "The importance of this achievement can be fully appreciated only by the medical and surgical men who have found in radiography, even within its hitherto limited scope, such an invaluable aid. For eight years in all the civilized countries of the world they have striven, in conjunction with the most expert radiograph photographers, to secure pictures of the living human skeleton as it moves, walks and pursues its various activities, but their efforts remained fruitless. Dr. E. L. Crusius, of the New York X-Ray Laboratories, who was among the most persistent of the seekers after this desired perfection of radiography, at last determined to call on the motion picture producers for assistance and made his appeal for aid to the Universal Company. This aid was given and complete success has at last been obtained.

"Among those already taken are pictures showing the bones of the elbow joint as it moves up and down and from side to side; of the bones of the knee joint as they move in walking, running and ascending and descending stairs, and of the more delicate bones of the foot and ankle in similar movements. In a sense it is human vivisection without submission on the part of the subject to discomfort or danger."

Triangle Lists "Evidence" This Month

"EVIDENCE" has been scheduled by Triangle as the first release of the week of January 20, with J. Barney Sherry as the featured player. The story was prepared by Jack Cunningham of the Triangle scenario staff, and is described as a story of professional life.

Another feature for this week is "Flames of Chance," with Margery Wilson in the star part. The story is an adaptation of "Three Godsons of Jeannette Contreau," by Francis W. Sullivan, which recently appeared in The Ladies' Home Journal.

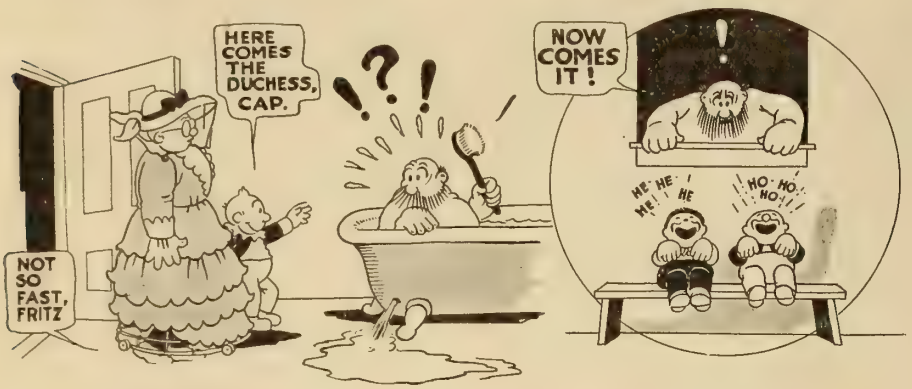
In this feature, Miss Wilson plays a duel role, first appearing as Jeannette Contreau, a pretty stenographer, who is desirous of aiding the boys at the front. This she does by writing three soldiers of the allied forces held prisoners in Germany.

Miss Wilson is supported by Jack Mulhall, a recent addition to the Triangle playing forces. Others in the cast are Wilbur Higbee and Anna Dodge. "Flames of Chance" was directed by Raymond Wells.

Gallons of trouble are said to be turned into barrels of laughter in the Keystone comedy, "Courts and Cabarets," also released January 20. There are four sets of triflers in this comedy and they trifle with each other's hearts with such rapidity that they are all landed in court. And it so happens that Max Asher, appearing as the judge, has purchased a bracelet for one of the ladies in court and Max has to do some explaining before he clears himself.

"Their Indian Uncle" and "The Price of His Head," one-reel Triangle Komedies, complete the week's releases.

Metro Adds "Her Boy" to Patriotic List



METRO has added another to its list of patriotic productions, which already includes "Lest We Forget," the multiple-reel Rita Jolivet feature which will have an early release; "The Slacker," starring Emily Stevens; "Draft 258," with Mabel Taliaferro as star, and the forthcoming seven-act special production, "The Legion of Death," starring Edith Storey as the leader of the Russian women-warriors.

This new patriotic production is called "Her Boy," and is said to present the war situation from a new angle, giving public answer to the silent protest of the mothers who do not want to give their sons up to the nation. The action of David Morrison in "Her Boy" is the only answer a self-respecting youth could make, Metro declares, and his mother, Helen Morrison, is brought to a realization of the patriotism that forgets self in service.

"Her Boy" will be released January 28 in Metro's regular Star Series. Effie Shannon has the leading role of Helen Morrison, who rebels against giving her son to the service of his country. Niles Welch plays "her boy," David Morrison.

"Her Boy" is from the pen of H. Carey Wonderly, and has been adapted for the screen by Albert Shelby Le Vino. It has been directed by George Irving, who makes his bow in Metro pictures with this production, and has been produced under the personal supervision of Maxwell Karger. Harry B. Harris is the photographer, and Leander de Cordova has assisted Mr. Irving in the direction.

Pathe's Cartoon, "Rub-a-dub-dub," Compromises as Well as Embarrasses the Captain, Who Got the Last Laugh—Maybe

Pathe Insists Cartoons Need Plot

"When Pathe presented the first successful animated cartoons some years ago," said a Pathe official the other day, "almost any animated cartoon could get by on the strength of the novelty alone. Audiences wondered how the effects were obtained, and we received scores of queries asking for a detailed statement as to how the thing was accomplished. Animated cartoons now, however, are no longer a novelty. They need real comedy scenarios behind them. They need production, smoothness, finish. They need a humorist to conceive them and experts to animate them. Crudeness of conception and execution is not tolerated."

The Pathe official continued: "At this office we go on record as saying that in our opinion the Happy Hooligan cartoon, 'Hearts and Horses,' released on January 13, is the funniest animated cartoon that has ever been made. And in 'Rub-a-dub-dub,' the Katzenjammer cartoon for January 20, we are releasing another that will score."

John R. Bray Scores Point in Litigation

It was announced last week from the offices of John B. Bray, who produces the Bray Pictographs for Paramount, that Mr. Bray has scored his second point in the action to nullify the patents which he obtained on the processes for making animated cartoons. It is said the action brought against Mr. Bray by Carl F. Lederer, of Rochester, has been dropped because of insufficient grounds whereon to establish a claim.

Recently the Bray-Hurd Process Company was formed to control the patents of Mr. Bray and Earl Hurd, who made some later additions to the original processes. Mr. Bray claims that since the patents held by this company cover completely the means of making animated cartoons, producers without a license attempt infringement. Action will be taken against them, Mr. Bray asserts.

Fox Cameraman Takes Scenes in France

Leon H. Caverly, former Fox Film Corporation cameraman, is now in France taking war pictures for the United States Marine Corps. A letter which he has written to the home office said in part: "You will probably be interested in knowing that I am getting some good stuff both in movies and stills, and in spite of the many inconveniences am really enjoying myself as a soldier."

Caverly is well known here.

Although much has been shown of the Panama Canal in pictures, additional views which are expected to be more vivid than preceding ones are announced for the 102nd release of Paramount-Bray Pictographs, the "magazine-on-the-screen." These scenes were secured by J. F. Leventhal of the Bray studios.

In this reel is also a length of film showing the art of Terpsichore as interpreted by the ancients of Egypt, Greece and India, as well as the more modern dances of Java, Japan, Hawaii and Spain.

Finley Nature Series Through Universal

The distribution of the Finley Nature Series of fish, bird and wild animal nature studies, through Universal exchanges, began January 14, with "Wild Birds and Animals at Home." These pictures will be carried in one-reel form whenever the length will permit, and in other instances the reel will be split with selected scenic.

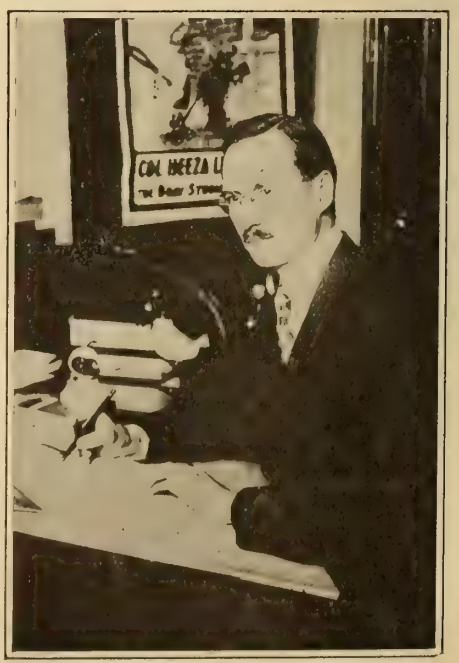
Others to follow are: "Taming Wild Birds," with a scenic; "Glimpses of Yosemite National Park," January 21; "The Bears of the Yellowstone," and a scenic, "The Long White Trail," January 28; "Sea Birds and Animals," with a scenic, "Gems of the Adriatic," February 4, and "The Salmon Fisheries of the Columbia," February 11.

Arabia Comes in for Picture Attention

A subject in the issue of Gaumont-Mutual Weekly on January 13 is intended, according to that company, to shed light on the extent of war activities in Arabia.

Of contrasted interest are other subjects in this issue, secured in Kansas, New Jersey, California, Boston and other places. The reel closes with "Winter Sport at Toy Town Tavern," at Winchendon, Mass., and the newest winter fashions which were recently exhibited at the Biltmore Ice Gardens for the benefit of the Red Cross.

Winter Bathers Caught by Hearst-Pathe



In Hearst-Pathe News, No. 3, several scenes are said to be devoted to New York's "polar bears," hardy individuals who go in bathing at Coney Island when the mercury is flirting with zero and when they have to dodge ice cakes.

There are also a number of scenes taken by the United States Government of our soldiers in France, showing the boys being taught the art of grenade throwing and "cleaning up" the enemies' trenches.

"The Knife" Scenes Shot at Jacksonville

In a recent issue of Motion Picture News an article referring to "location shots" of "The Knife," which Select Pictures recently acquired, stated that the site of activities was Miami, Fla. The Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce advises that the Southern scenes for "The Knife" were secured by Select in and around Jacksonville.

The distance between the two Florida cities is about 400 miles.

CANADIAN FORESTS AND CITIES

A rapid survey of the Dominion that lies across our northern border is afforded in the Essanay release "Through Canada from Coast to Coast" (General Film Company). We start with a view of the rugged shores of Nova Scotia, where wooden ships are building. Then come glimpses of Montreal and Toronto and some interesting pictures taken in and about the locks of the Saulte Sainte Marie. From the Great Lakes we enter the forest tract of Canada and enjoy the experience of a trip down the rapids in Indian canoes and the pleasures of camping and fishing. A night scene in Winnipeg and views of Calgary are followed by another stretch of mountain scenery with an impressive view of a long train rounding a curve. Vancouver is reached and its fine homes visited. Then, with a steamer trip across the bay, we reach Victoria, whose splendid parks and handsome houses give it the reputation of being the "finest residential town in Canada."

SEEING THROUGH YOURSELF

Illuminating in more senses than one is that part of Universal Screen Magazine No. 55 devoted to motion pictures taken under the X-ray. You grasp at once how novel and interesting such a subject may be. Most of us have seen photographs of bones taken through the solid flesh, but never have we seen the living bones in actual motion. Here on the screen appear first the flesh-covered hand or foot as we ordinarily perceive it, moving easily and gracefully. Then, literally in a flash, the member is denuded and appears as a bony framework, working with the precision of a machine. The use of the X-ray in making a medical or surgical diagnosis is also clearly illustrated and explained.

Too bad the X-ray cannot be employed in exposing fraud! In this number of the Magazine one fruitful source of ill-gotten wealth is shown—that of "mine salting." The ease with which the mine is given a superficial appearance of gold bearing is a warning to the optimistic and ignorant investor in stocks.

Of interest to the housewife and the children are the other two subjects on the reel—the raising of goats for milk and a method of putting up foods in packages without the touch of hand. We commend the goats not only for their value in these war-thrift days, but for their lively and humorous characteristics.

OFFERED BY THE NEWS WEEKLIES

Subject for subject and foot for foot, Hearst-Pathe News No. 3 and Universal Current Events No. 35, both released January 5, run a close race in interest and excellence of presentation. Both reels feature scenes in Italy showing the Allies' trucks rushing supplies to the front. Each reel has several fine shots of the wonderful mountain roads. The foreign sections display our men receiving instructions in grenade throwing, while the Current Events gives space also to our aviators and the huge twin-propeller American flying machine.

Both the Pathe and the Universal cameramen were in Philadelphia on New Year's Day and caught the gorgeously grotesque Mummers in their annual parade. The destructive fire at Norfolk, Virginia, supposed to be of incendiary origin, appears on both reels.

As individual features, the Hearst-Pathe News offers the arrival of the thirty army trucks at the end of their 600-mile run from Detroit, scenes at a rodeo given at Fort Riley, Kans., participated in by soldier cowboys and soldier Indians; the celebrated "Polar Bears," who frisk in the icy waters of Coney Island and enjoy a rubdown with snow on the beach, and some exciting scenes of skiing at Cary, Illinois. Universal Current Events recalls with a bit of historic film the return, just a year ago, of the United States punitive expedition to Mexico under the command of "Black Jack" Pershing, and shows in his present guise the splendid and popular commander of our army across the water.

Universal Animated Weekly No. 6 has many timely reminders of Winter. While we don't quite believe in the fish that the occupants of the automobile pull from the frozen Hudson, we must admit the depth of the ice which forms a solid sheet from bank to bank at Tarrytown and offers a new route for motorists. The Winter's snow is enjoyed by the tobogganers, who don't mind a spill into the drifts, but the distressful side of the cold season is evidenced by the efforts here shown to relieve hunger and delayed traffic. A pleasing diversion in these more familiar scenes is the pageant of the Lord Mayor's Show in London. This year it is of course military in character and includes a tank, captured guns, and a division of the famous "Waacs," or Women's Auxiliary Army Corps, that is doing noble service on the fighting front.

National Committee Works with Exhibitor

"WE take all kinds of money," genially remarked Mr. Croker, in the days when the taking was good.

The exhibitor, with an anxious eye on the reel tax, the admission tax, and the music tax, cannot afford to overlook any possible class of patrons. The habitual enthusiast he can still count on, and that floating population that drops in on a show, irrespective of its merits, merely to pass an evening. But there is a certain class of patronage that must be wooed, and can only be won and held by clean, wholesome entertainment of a uniform grade. Assured that it can count on this, it will come steadily and with increasing interest. This class has been well denominated "the family group." It is made up of the conservative "world and his wife" who perhaps once or twice a week will visit a "good movie," and on Fridays, when there are no school lessons to be done, will bring the children.

Such an evening's entertainment must be chosen with special care. It must be lively, well-balanced, and interesting. But it must be absolutely free of the ever-sensational, the suggestive, and that form of fun which is tainted with vulgarity.

To educate this public to the fact that such pictures exist in abundance and to help the exhibitor obtain them without trouble or loss of time, the National Board of Review of Motion Pictures created, some months ago, a National Committee for Better Films to carry on through organization the work initiated by Helen Duey in her "Better Films" Department of The Woman's Home Companion. Out of this has grown the Affiliated Committee for Better Films, a national federation embracing clubs and committees of men and women all over the country who are working, each in its own community, to help the exhibitor in his efforts to offer the "family group" program. Lists of selected features and comedies are sent out by the Committee for Better Films to its affiliated committees. These latter co-operate with exhibitors in choosing programs, stimulating local interest, and increasing patronage. They also send in reports of their work to the parent organization, which in turn embodies these reports, together with short editorials on various phases of the movement, in a monthly bulletin.

Any exhibitor who feels the need or sees the wisdom of taking part in this admirable enterprise would do well to communicate with Mr. Herbert F. Sherwood, Editor of the Bulletin of the Affiliated Committees for Better Films, at 70 Fifth avenue, New York, who will send him literature and indicate how he may secure the co-operation and support needed by him in his own community.

VARIED AND PLEASING

Nicely balanced in its appeal to masculine and feminine patrons is Paramount-Bray Pictograph, No. 100, its two main features being the terrible explosive familiarly known as "T N T," and a new art of dress combining beauty, simplicity and economy.

"T N T" was the main cause of the destruction of Halifax. Its terrific powers are here shown, when in the hands of our army it is used to tear up rails, bomb trenches, bring chimneys to earth, and in other ways facilitate offensive warfare.

The change from this stern subject to that of feminine attire is pleasing. Miss Bertha Holley, a very comely exponent of the art, appears in a variety of costumes, whose component parts are extremely simple, but whose combined effect is in every way suitable for the occasion, graceful and becoming. The gowns vary from a simple affair for the home to a gorgeous cloak which can be worn on either side.

Goodrich Dirt tries a little masquerade among the owners of yachts and titles, but is finally reduced to taking refuge in the midst of his "woist enemy."

"HER BIT"; ALSO HIS

The surprising sex is always, in these days, springing another surprise in the way of a new war activity. Here in Paramount-Bray Pictograph No. 100 is Mrs. Anita M. Baldwin, daughter of "Lucky" Baldwin of California, doing her part by training dogs for actual service on the battlefield. The clever little chaps are bred especially for the purpose, being a cross from the Airedale. In contrast to these serviceable but plain canines are beautiful Russian wolf hounds, whose every move is instinct with grace and high breeding.

Everyone's doing it. Or if he isn't, she is. So everyone will enjoy seeing how she (or he) looks when she (or he) "knits a bit" for the boys in camp. Everything is to said for knitting. It is easy, it can be done by almost any man, woman, or child (and is!) under almost any circumstances, and it is the one thing that Uncle Sam is asking every one of us to do. The Bray Studios have handled the subject in a novel and amusing fashion and produced a picture that is pleasant, patriotic, and profitable, in more senses than one.

Bobby Bumps, fired to deeds of greater daring than his comparatively mild domestic exploits, constructs a "tank" and proceeds to demolish an enemy cornfield. Bobby escapes not quite unscathed.

The entire reel is one that would be particularly well-suited to a Children's Matinee.

ONE SCENIC AND ANOTHER

Comparisons may not be polite. In fact, from a business point of view they are often decidedly *im*politic. But the appearance in one week of two fine scenics on the same subject tempts the reviewer to tread the dangerous path.

Both the Pathe Exchange and the Educational Films Corporation use Rainier National Park as their current scenic release, the latter under Robert Bruce's title of "Beside the Glimmer-Glass." Each shows a party of men, sometimes on horseback, again on foot where no other method of progress is possible, against a background of impressive magnificence and beauty. Paradise and Mystic Valleys, the strange peaks known as Pinnacle Rocks, the adventure of a climb over the glaciers that skirt Mr. Rainier, are features of each picture. Yet the impartial spectator must admit that the Bruce picture has a quality not possessed by the other. It is that indescribable yet essential thing called imagination. Evidenced in so many forms of artistic expression, it here appears in scenes and titles which reflect the life and the feeling of the human and animal creatures that linger in the wonderful playground. Pathe's "Rainier National Park" inspires us with a due respect for the wonderful scenery of our native land. It is so far as it goes entirely satisfactory. "Beside the Glimmer-Glass," however, left this particular spectator with the firm determination to "come back," when the time arrives for her to revisit this sphere, re-embodied in masculine guise and to spend her vacations where the foaming waters of a glacier tumble under larch-fringed banks and birds hop down in friendly response to the fragrance of the steaming flapjack.

"Tarzan of the Apes" Completed

Screen Version of Burrough's Work Given by National Film Corporation of America — Unusual Drama—Strong Cast

THE National Film Corporation of America announces the completion of the screen version of Edgar Rice Burrough's work of fiction, "Tarzan of the Apes." William Parsons, president of the company, arrived in New York last week and engaged headquarters at 1604 Broadway. He will inaugurate an advertising campaign and make plans for the distribution and exhibition of the feature.

The production itself is now being assembled and a print is expected in New York, when the picture will be opened at a Broadway theatre at the regular price scale.

"Tarzan of the Apes" was picturized from the famous Tarzan books, four of which are on the market and the sale of which books exceed two million copies. The first book was issued in 1914.

At the time of its publication "Tarzan of the Apes," as a serial in over six thousand papers, was pronounced the fiction sensation of American literature.

The story tells of the marooning on an island near the African coast of a British nobleman and his wife. After undergoing many hardships the mother gives birth to a boy baby and dies. The father, attacked by terrifying animals, foremost of which were huge anthropoid apes, succumbs and a she-ape, whose young one had been killed the same day, steals the child from the cradle and adopts him.

The moter ape accords the same affection, care and protection to the boy she would have her own, had it lived, and he develops into a monster of tremendous strength. It bears a facial likeness to his father, has every characteristic of the human race, but the strength, tastes and mental attitudes of the ape.

Then love comes to him. He sees the first white woman, in Jane Porter, who with her father and a party are cast ashore on the island.

The National Film Corporation report the cost of the picture as being in the neighborhood of a quarter-million dollars. The cast includes Elmo Lincoln, Enid Markey, True Boardman, George French, Kathleen Kirkham, Gordon Griffith, Bessie Toner, Thomas Jefferson and Colin Kenny.

Nine cars were necessary to carry the principals and properties to jungle locations in certain sections of the country in which the numerous scenes were made.

Native villages covering acres of ground were erected in the open to stage the production. Fifty-seven aerial acrobats were engaged by the company for use in the jungle scenes to impersonate species of the babboon and ape tribes. More than three hundred thousand feet of negative were exposed.

You are not going to war. The men who are need all the comforts you can give them. Help them get cigarettes. That is your patriotic duty. If you aren't helping in the "smokes" campaign, get busy—now. Don't be a slacker!

Evidence Healthy Condition of Open Market

As proof of the healthy condition of the market in contradiction to the opinion of some that the market is depressed, Frank Hall, president and general manager of the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation, announces that he has more than twice as many prints of "The Zeppelin's Last Raid" out, as are ordinarily needed to supply the demand for the regular program feature. The same applies, he says, to "The Belgian" and "Those Who Pay." These features are now on the market in all parts of the world, the foreign distributing rights controlled by the Robertson-Cole Company of New York and London.

Independent Company Changes Name

Southwestern Film Corporation is the new name of the southern independent distributing organization formerly known as The Southwestern Art Dramas, Inc., it is announced.

Southwestern Film Corporation is incorporated under Texas laws. F. M. Sanford, manager; L. C. McHenry, sales manager; A. Feickert, secretary and treasurer. Executive offices are located at 1911½ Commerce street, Dallas. The territory covered by this concern is Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, North and South Carolina, Florida and Georgia. Billy West—King Bee Comedies, "Crisis," "Souls Redeemed," "The Black Stork," "It May be Your Daughter," "The Webb of Life," "Twilight Sleep," "The Human Orchard" and "The Libertine" are released in this territory by the Southwestern.

William Parsons is in the East arranging releasing details of "Tarzan of the Apes," which has been completed on the West Coast. Enid Markey and Elmo Lincoln have leading roles, and other well-known players are in the cast

"The Belgian" to Show for Belgian Society

Sidney Olcott's production, "The Belgian," which is released by the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation, is to be shown in San Francisco for the benefit of the Belgium Relief Society. Frank Hall, president of the U. S. Booking Corporation, received a request from the society and he has complied, it is announced. The feature will be shown in the St. Francis Hotel, San Francisco.

At the presentation of "The Belgian" at the Ritz-Carlton, New York, recently, under the auspices of Sidney Olcott, a large sum was realized for the relief of the Belgians. Hundreds of men and women prominent in diplomatic, political and society circles attended and were warm in their praise of the Olcott production, the manner in which it drove home to the audience the desolation of the little kingdom of grief and also the artistry with which it was produced and acted by Miss Valentine Grant, Walker Whiteside and supporting cast.

Early Trade Showing for Flynn's "The Eagle's Eye"

Trade showings of "The Eagle's Eye," the Wharton serial which was written by William J. Flynn, recently retired chief of the U. S. Secret Service, will be given shortly in the twenty-one cities where Foursquare exchanges are located, it is announced, by M. H. Hoffman of the Foursquare Pictures Corporation.

Unique Advertising Campaign for "Mother"

Arthur N. Sawyer and Herbert Lubin of General Enterprises, Inc., which organization is distributing on a state right basis the George Loane Tucker production, "Mother," have completed arrangements for an extensive line of exploitation matter to accompany the McClure Pictures feature. The complete story of "Mother" in abbreviated novel form made up with an attractive cover and so designed as to fit the pocket easily has been published. An extensive press sheet has been prepared in which is incorporated appropriate stories for program and newspaper use, biographical sketches of George Loane Tucker, the producer, Eden Philpott, the author, and Elisabeth Risdon, the star of the production. The press sheet also contains the poem, "Mother," by Kate Douglas Wiggin.

Wolfberg Predicts Big Year for Amusements

Harris P. Wolfberg, Harris P. Wolfberg Attractions, Pittsburgh, in his address before the convention of salesmen and sales managers of this company, held New Year's day, predicted one of the biggest and most successful years for the amusement business. He said that the quest for amusement would be stimulated rather than lessened by the war. Plans were discussed for the new year. A dinner was given in the evening at the William Penn Hotel. Mr. Wolfberg presided as toastmaster.

Exhibitor Promoted to Sergeant in U. S. Army

Harry Hall, brother of Frank Hall, president and general manager of the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation, has been promoted to a sergeancy in the 305th Infantry at Camp Dix, Wrightstown, N. J., where he has been stationed for the last few months. Sergeant Hall presented recently "The Zeppelin's Last Raid," distributed by the booking corporation, at the camp, holding two shows, one for officers and one for the regiment. Mr. Hall will show also "Those Why Pay" and "The Belgian" at Camp Dix soon.

Before entering the service Mr. Hall was manager of the U. S. theatre, Hoboken; the City theatre, Newark; the U. S. Astor theatre, Plainfield, and the U. S. Garden theatre, Elizabeth.

Shipley Succeeds Balsly as Standard Manager

Following the announcement made last week of the resignation of L. D. Balsly as manager of the Standard Film Corporation office at 1305 Walnut street, Kansas City, Mo., the home office this week states that the succeeding manager will be John L. Shipley, widely known as a film man in the East and Middle West.

Mr. Shipley has been connected with the office of the Goldwyn Company, at Kansas City. He has a wide circle of acquaintanceship among the exhibitors of Kansas and Missouri, and is in receipt of many letters of congratulation since the news of his appointment. He is as well liked among exchange men as he is popular with exhibitors.

The Standard office, at Kansas City, distributete the Billy West Comedies, Christie Comedies, the two-reel W. H.-William S. Hart productions, and the William S. Hart feature, "The Bargain," "The Masque of Life" is also handled by the Standard.

Garson Gets Territory for "Parentage"

Harry I. Garson, personal manager of Clara Kimball Young, has closed with "Wid" Gunning for "Parentage" for Michigan and Ohio, and will open the picture simultaneously in both States. It is the intention to carry on a tremendous advertising campaign—characteristic of Garson's way of doing things. "Parentage" is declared to have been breaking all records in New England during the terribly cold weather—playing to 60,000 admissions in Boston—broke all records in Springfield, Mass., and Holyoke, holding a line for hours at twelve degrees below zero. As one local manager wired in: "'Parentage' as a bear is a Polar bear."

Piedmont Announces Change in Management

Piedmont Pictures Corporation last week sent out a number of leters throughout the country in reference to the withdrawal of Felix Malitz and G. A. Engler from the management of the company.

The letter said, in part: "We herewith inform you that Felix Malitz and G. A. Engler have completely severed their connections with this corporation.

"The change of management does not in the least affect our business and any matters which are pending with your good selves or any future business with you, will be given the most careful attention."

"The Cast-Off" Bought by George Backer

"The Cast-Off," an Ince production, with Bessie Barriscale featured, has been purchased by George Backer for distribution through Foursquare Pictures. The photoplay is in six reels and was directed by Raymond B. West.

Those who have seen "The Cast-Off" at a specially arranged private showing agree that it is one of the strongest in its heart appeal which has been produced in the last three years. The story is by C. Gardner Sullivan and contains bits of appropriate comedy and human touches.

P. V. R. Key, director of sales and advertising for Foursquare Pictures, said: "The committee which passes upon all pictures had seen a great number that had been highly recommended, and several of which were of exceptional merit. Mr. M. H. Hoffman, whose judgment and standard of pictures is the very highest, is more enthusiastic over 'The Cast-Off' than over any feature he has seen. He pronounces it the finest picture Foursquare ever acquired.

"From the exhibitors's standpoint, 'The Cast-Off' should go over as one of the biggest features of the year. Miss Barriscale's popularity, her superlative acting in this picture and its all-around excellence will make it talked about for long after it is shown."

"The PRICE of a GOOD TIME"

it's a Lois Weber Production

IN plain, commercial English—what's the reason for the instant and overwhelming success of this play?

They know instinctively that only tragedy can result—and they must have that Big Thrill!

WHY do the crowds go away advertising it for you?

Because Lois Weber—the Belasco of the Screen—has created with Mildred Harris a true, human, lovable character, essentially innocent, just as your audience wants her to be.

Exploiting a State Rights Feature

By Joseph F. Lee

"Joe" Lee

STRANGE as it may seem the state rights operator who is the consumer, is the last to be consulted by the manufacturer or producer of film offered on the open market. Surely the state rights buyer is of some importance, as the success of the producer and his product rests upon his action in the matter. Much money would be saved if he were consulted first. He knows what he wants and in order to be successful he must know the value of the product in his territory.

Another important point is a feature offered on a state rights basis must be stronger in merit and box-office value than a feature offered by releasing programs, as the independent operator must have a product stronger than most of the features which are released weekly by the different program combinations. If not, what inducement has the independent operator to offer the exhibitor, with the market already overcrowded with fairly good productions which are offered at reasonable rentals? Many are of the opinion that any old feature which is not strong enough for a program can be offered on a state rights basis and figure that a quick fortune can be made, and are very much surprised to find that there is no market for their product at all—the open market demanding a stronger product than the producer realizes.

Many a feature would be saved from failure if properly cut and edited by a committee of expert sub-titlers before it is shown to the trade and the reviewers, the idea being to make it as near 100 per cent as possible. Is is not a fact that all program releases are carefully gone over time and time again by experts and all faults remedied before they are shown to the trade or public? But the case of most of the producers of state rights features is generally reversed, as most of the faults and cutting of useless footage is done after a trade showing, when suggestions are made by buyers. Reviewers and trade papers are blamed for their frank and honest criticism, and of course sales and bookings are hurt likewise. Would it not be a simple matter to have done this before offering the feature at all?

Paper and advertising matter is another important item that must not be overlooked and should be handled by some one who has had experience in this line, as the state rights buyer expects an attractive line of paper and most of his success is based on this.

At this time the state rights market is in a very bad condition but better conditions are bound to come. One thing certain—there will be a scarcity of state rights film, and this should help those who have a product of merit that are willing to sell at a reasonable figure. Some claim this slump in the market is due to overproduction. Others claim it is due to the excessive prices asked for territorial rights.

Now, between these two opinions we should strike somewhere a happy medium, and perhaps some day some manufacturer or group of men may enter the state rights field, produce features of merit and box office value and offer to sell their territorial rights at a figure that will enable the independent exchange man to offer his product to the exhibitor at a rental price that will enable the producer, exchange man and exhibitor to make a reasonable profit. With such men who know the state rights market and who are satisfied with a fair and reasonable profit on each production, they will find a ready market. Most of the producers expect to retire on the profits of one production. Some may enter the field on a safe and sane basis—cut down a lot of wasteless overhead, make what is known as a one price house, with the prices based on a reasonable amount for each territory. The way most film is sold now is to ask ten thousand for a territory and take four thousand. Much time and money is lost by both parties, doing business along these lines, whereas if there was a one-price figure, and a fair one, a deal could be quickly consummated by both parties. Any one entering the state rights business along these lines will find a good profit on the right side of the ledger.

"Inferior Story Bound to Fail"

H. J. Shepard Says Good Story and Good Cast Are as Essential to Successful Production as Food and Water to Body

H. J. SHEPARD, special representative, W. H. Productions, strikes from the shoulder in the following pertinent remarks concerning the relative values of the story and star, to the successful production. He says:

"Would you give a boy a piece of highly priced wood to whittle? Would you expect him to carve from it with a jack knife, pleasing and beautiful figures just because the material was expensive? Of course you would not! Then how can one expect a beautiful and artistic and interesting portrayal of a good story without skilled workmen, a good consistent cast and star and good direction, to properly interpret it?

"On the other hand would you go to a man skilled in artcraft and expect him to turn out an extra piece of work if you supplied him with material of a very inferior grade? No! He is a human being with limited capabilities. There are times, no doubt, when he would be able to camouflage small defects in the material, but if a large number of them appeared, his art would be too heavily taxed. This is the situation that exists with a poor story, with a good cast or combination of good cast and star. Both are bound to fail.

"If you were asked the question which of the two, food or water, you thought you could subsist better on to perpetuate your life, you would answer instantly by saying that neither, by itself would be sufficient. It is a known fact that a man can, for a short time, live on either the food or the water without the other, but it is likewise a conclusively proved fact that it is only for a short period.

"A question that has been given a great deal of time and thought and has been the basis for a great number of successes and failures and which constantly confronts the producer is whether or not the 'star' system or the 'story' system is the proper one to perpetuate the life of the photoplay. It seems that the logical answer to this question is, 'there should be a combination of a good story interpreted by a good cast with or without a big star, and good direction.'

"The public is like the human body. It possesses appetites—one of them an appetite for pleasure. It is this appetite that the producer must cater to and satisfy and upon its success depends the existence of the producer. He may offer them a wonderful story, poorly interpreted, or a big star with a poor story, both of which would be failures. It is, however, safe to say that if two productions of the same story were made simultaneously, one possessing the asset of a star and the other without it, and with all other things equal, the story with the star would be more successful. If the story of inferior value is thrust upon a star, he is bound to fail. It is to be admitted, however, that his name will attract patrons, no matter how bad the story might be, but if he has disappointed them, they cease to be his admirers. Naturally the theatre suffers.

"The producer who wants to be conservative and give the maximum results in his production, must consistently secure good stories and choose a good cast of proper types to interpret these stories. There must be a combination of all these various ingredients to make a perfect success of any production. We have seen that food nourishes the human body and that water assists it in its process and that their combination was the solution in obtaining a successful conclusion. The 'story' nourishes the appetite of pleasure and the story and a good consistent cast with or without the star, plus good direction, is as necessary to complete the process of nourishment as is the water to food."

"The Crucible of Life," in seven parts, stars Grace D'Armand, Jack Sherrill and Frank O'Connor. The picture is distributed by General Enterprises, Inc.

General Enterprises Get "Crucible of Life"

Arthur H. Sawyer and Herbert Lubin, of General Enterprises, Inc., announce that they have acquired the rights to "The Crucible of Life," a seven-part society melodrama. The story is an adaptation from the stage play and novel, "Fairfax," written by Bartley Campbell.

"The Crucible of Life" was directed by Captain Harry Lambart. A cast of prominent artists, headed by Grace D'Armond, at present featured with Vitagraph; Jack Sherrill and Frank O'Connor, who played the original title role in "Fairfax," interpret the principal roles.

It was produced by the Authors Film Company, from which concern General Enterprises, Inc., acquired the rights for the United States and Canada. An extensive exploitation drive in the interests of "The Crucible of Life" has been started. Arrangements have been completed for a run at the Park theatre, New York, commencing January 20. The picture will be distributed on the independent market by General Enterprises, Inc.

A trade showing will be given in one of the New York hotels in the near future, it is announced. Inasmuch as "The Crucible of Life" contains a certain amount of war atmosphere, the executives of General Enterprises, Inc., have arranged for the appearance at the showing and dinner to follow, of Private Frederick R. Rath and the Camp Upton quartet. Mr. Rath is the author of the internationally famous war song, "When the Moon is Shining Somewhere in France."

Slacker Theme in Pathe New Release

The slacker theme supplies the material for a five-reel feature called "Mrs. Slacker," which Pathe plans to release in the near future, it was announced this week by that company. Gladys Hulette and Creighton Hale will be presented as co-stars, supported by Paul Clergot, in a principal role.

Hobart Henley staged the picture, and is said to have enriched it with many novel scenes.

"The Guilty Man" for an Early Showing

PARAMOUNT'S screen version of the A. H. Woods' legitimate production, "The Guilty Man," which was presented in 1916 at the Astor theatre in New York, will shortly be released, according to an announcement last week. It will be the first A. H. Woods motion picture to be released by Paramount. Irvin W. Willat directed it, under Thomas H. Ince's supervision.

In describing the story of "The Guilty Man," Paramount states that it makes a deep study of man's moral responsibility, and unmercifully exposes and flays conditions arising from the practice of the "double standard." The woman, for her misplaced trust in the man she loves, is brutually punished by society. The man goes free. "The Guilty Man" stamps the searing brand of guilt upon the man responsible.

The story tells of Marie Dubois, who loves Claude Lescuyer too well. Claude casts off Marie to marry a woman of his class. A daughter is born to Marie and is named Claudine. To provide a father for her daughter, Marie marries Flambon, keeper of a low resort.

Gloria Hope is Claudine, the daughter. Vivian Reed plays the mother. William Garwood has the difficult part of Claude and Charles French is Flambon. Others in the cast are Hal Cooley, John Steppling, J. P. Lockne and Hayward Mack.

The photography is said to be excellent and the settings are described as gorgeous. The dramatic intensity of the scenes, Paramount declares, has been artistically handled, and throughout it is expected to be a production that will make the spectators gasp and hold tight to their seats.

"An Era of Awakening at Hand"

"Star Will Vanish and Exhibitors Will Book Independently on Merit Pictures—Days of "Bluff and Bluster" Over

THE trend of 1918 in the motion picture industry is pointed out by M. H. Hoffman, Hoffman-Foursquare Pictures, in the following interview:

"The trend of 1918 in motion pictures is very clear to those who will read what is written indelibly upon the signboard of progress. It is unmistakable. For months past the forebodings of changes that are to better the industry have been rumbling, each week marking some new beginning which has been as inevitable as the tide.

"Metaphorically speaking, tomorrow will usher in another departure; the day after yet another. Before summer present apprehensions will have melted before the assuaging influences of corrective measures that will reinvigorate every branch of the industry and benefit all who are striving sincerely to build upon a substantial foundation.

"The making, distribution and exhibition of motion pictures are callings which are still young. The growth of the industry as a whole has been like a mushroom—so swift, indeed, that changes have ensued before those concerned in them had time to give them sufficient thought.

"But another era of awakening is at hand. The days of bluff and bluster, of broken promises and false values, of extravagance and careless management, are numbered. The 'hip-hurrah' man, grown suddenly rich in spite of his pitiable conceit and limited store of brains, is commencing to realize that, after all, motion pictures must be treated as a commercial business and forever divorced from whatever will not tend to put them upon a sane business basis.

"The war tax has been the final element to prod the obstinate into a realization that many of the methods in the making and distributing of motion pictures have been wrong. One of the roots is the long existing fallacy of trusting to luck. We are all acquainted with this man, whether he has conducted his affairs either as an individual or corporation.

"But he is doomed. A destroyer, he will be slowly trampled under the foot of progress. A few of his type, fattened by unearned and dishonorably gotten profits, will hang on for a while but the rank and file of him has already been shunted upon the toboggan for a slide into obscurity where he can do no more harm.

"During 1918 the stars will fall. Not all of them; not those who legitimately are stars, of course. I mean the $100 a week actor or actress who has been paid ten times his or her actual worth.

"And the dear old programs—they, too, are in for a change so severe that when the job is done their own progenitors won't know them. Going, going—presently to be gone—are the bookings of everything in sight put out by a single producer—distributor firm.

"In its place is coming, on a scale that will sweep the country, the rise of the independent booking. No longer the club, to compel the exhibitor to rent five bad pictures in order to get one which is good. This weapon is being encased in waddings of thick cotton batting, so that its hardest wallops won't hurt a fly.

"The industry is in for some hard knocks, but they will be constructive ones which are to bring it benefits. So let them come, for the industry is in sore need of a lusty chastisement to bring many in it to their senses."

"Good Re-Issues Well Received

This Is the Opinion of B. L. Hadfield, General Manager of Wisconsin Film Corporation in Praising Hart Re-Issues

W. H. PRODUCTIONS is in receipt of a letter from B. L. Hedfield, general manager of Wisconsin Film Corporation, Wisconsin, in which Mr. Hadfield gives the opinion of several Wisconsin exhibitors on the W. H. Productions releases of the William S. Hart features. Mr. Hadfield says in part:

"I have talked personally to a number of exhibitors, regarding your release with W. S. Hart as 'The Two-Gun Man' in 'The Bargain.' I control 'The Birth of a Nation' in Wisconsin, and spend considerable time with each exhibitor, and we have talked regarding different subjects—actors and productions. I find that about 90 per cent of the exhibitors state that William S. Hart is one of the biggest attractions. I have personally noticed that a great many re-issues with good stars, have secured more money at the box office than some of the stars in new productions.

"For example: I was standing in front of the box office in a certain city not long ago when I noticed a party of six walk up and look at the posters and photos in front of the theatre, four of the party wanted to go to the theatre across the street, when one of the young men said: 'Why, I saw that picture two years ago; it's a pippin'—needless to say, they all went in. The picture was a re-issue in one of the best down-town houses. This theatre was getting two for one of the house across the street, which is an exceptionally good house—and it struck me very forcibly at the time. That same evening, I talked with the man across the street, and asked him why he did not book some of these re-issues, and he stated that his was a first-run house and his patrons would kick. I then asked him how many total paid admissions he had that day, and found that the house running the re-issue had about two to his one. I told him that I believed that the public was better satisfied with the picture across the street, even though it was a re-issue, than with the picture he was running. He finally agreed with me."

Kaufman Specials Looses Film in Mississippi

Abe H. Kaufman, Kaufman Specials, Memphis, Tenn., writes the MOTION PICTURE NEWS the following letter which explains itself:

"On Thursday, November 15, we shipped the following eight reels to Roy Wallace, at Ingomar, Miss.: "Hans and Fritz in Barnyard," "American War News, No. 3"; "Nature Fakers," "Long Shift," two reels; "Vampire," two reels; "Man of the Hills."

"We were under the impression that this party operated a theatre there, but when our films were not returned we investigated the matter and learned that he was operating a traveling show. Although we have made repeated efforts through letters, wires, and finally through the sheriff, we have been unable to secure the return of these films. We would appreciate you calling the attention of the exhibitors and exchange men throughout the country of the fact that our film has been taken by Wallace, and that any information that will assist us in locating these reels will be appreciated.

Gerard's Story Nearly Completed by Nigh

DIRECTOR WILLIAM NIGH announces the final scenes for the Mark M. Dintenfass Productions, Inc. production, "My Four Years In Germany," which is adapted from Ambassador James W. Gerard's book of the same title.

Ambassador Gerard has assisted personally Mr. Nigh in transferring his story to the screen. The story, beginning with the Zabern incident in Germany, which first aroused the civil against the military power is told in sequence.

"My Four Years In Germany" is interpreted by exact types of the principals in Germany's warfare. Mr. Gerard says that the types selected are most remarkable examples of the duplication of one man's appearance by another. It is said that the picture reveals spectacular incidents and scenes and that no expense or pains have been spared to make this not only true historically, but big and impressive as a theatrical production. The picture when completed and cut, will be presented first in Washington in one of the Government buildings. Officials of the Government will be present and Mr. Gerard will address the gathering.

"Natural Law" Ready for Release

France Film, Inc., After Several Weeks Intensive Campaigning Offer "The Natural Law" on Independent Market

THE initial production of France Film, Inc., "The Natural Law," is now ready for the state rights market after several weeks of careful campaign preparations, according to the announcements made this week by that concern.

At the recent trade showing at the Broadway theatre, New York, this production, which features pretty Marguerite Courtot, supported by Howard Hall and George Larkin, caused critics to state their belief that the screen version of "The Natural Law" even surpassed the play itself, which had such a phenomenal run in the East and is at present making a successful tour of the country.

As a play "The Natural Law" was seen by thousands during its eight months' run at the Republic theatre, New York city. As a picture it should attract millions of people, because of the wide scope of the screen. The daring and originality of its plot, its universal appeal and elaborate production should make it one of the most talked-of films in years. The story has also been published in book form and has met with an unusualy large sale throughout the country.

The topic treats of one of the great problems of life, and Charles H. France, who directed the production, is said to have brought into being a film story full of dramatic suspense, sensations and interest.

A complete line of advertising material has been arranged and secured by France Films, Inc., for the proper handling of the picture. Included in this are two styles of one sheets, two styles of three sheets, one style of six sheets and a twenty-four sheets stand. Three sizes of photo include black and white in the 8 x 10 size, and colored sets, size 11 x 14 and 22 x 28. In addition to this there are heralds, several styles of slides and a press book. According to officials of the company, service to buyers will not end with the sale of teritory, but will be continued in every case so that the picture may be properly and successfully exploited. Photographs have been made of the full lobby display for mailing to all prospective purchasers.

M. G. Watkins, prominent Mid-West film man identified with various motion picture enterprises, is secretary of France Films, Inc., and will leave Chicago for the East this week to give his entire attention to the selling campaign on "The Natural Law." The company reports an exceptionally large number of inquiries on the picture and expects to close all available territory in record time.

In and Out of West Coast Studios

By J. C. Jessen

MARSHALL NEILAN, who has directed the Mary Pickford company for the past year, is to direct one or more subjects starring Constance Talmadge, who is working at the Morosco studio of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. William D. Taylor, who for the past year has been directing Vivian Martin subjects, has been selected as director for Miss Pickford, and the Pickford company will continue to work at the Lasky studios.

Universal Expands

Present indications point to activities at Universal City being back to the former state in the near future. Early in the fall the Universal Company began reducing its producing staff, and it was cut from twenty-six producing units down to ten. The producing forces reached its minimum strength about Thanksgiving time, but since then additional directors and players have been added almost every week, and the force is now increased to seventeen companies. In other words, seventeen directors and sufficient players for each are now employed with the exception that some of the directors work alternately with the same stars.

In engaging people for the Universal, as the producing organization is enlarged, the executives will show preference to mothers, wives, sisters and other dependents of men who have sacrificed their work to serve the Government in the Liberty Army, according to instructions which have been received by President Carl Laemmle.

Joseph deGrasse, who has been directing Franklyn Farnum, was taken ill last week with what threatens to be a nervous breakdown, and he induced Lynn Reynolds to complete the picture he had begun work on. This is titled "The Mollycoddle," an original story and scenario by Eugene B. Lewis and Waldemar Young. Reynolds recently left the Triangle Company, and since has been devoting his time to the writing of stories which he will produce later. Mr. Reynolds is considering several offers, and will shortly make announcement of his permanent plans. His most recent production, "The Gown of Destiny," for Triangle, is spoken of by all critcs and exhibitors as his best work to date.

Wells Directs Subject

One of the new subjects in production by Triangle is titled "The Hard Rock Breed," and is an adaptation by Frederick Bechdolt for the screen of his own magazine story of the same title. Director Raymond Wells is in charge of making this, and with his entire company has gone to Colton, where many of the exterior scenes will be made at quarries near that place. The story has to do principally with two men who begin as workers at the same time. J. Barney Sherry is impersonating one of the men, while Jack Curtis is the other.

When it was found it would be impossible for the Roy Stewart-Cliff Smith Western Triangle Company to begin work on their next subject, "Boss of the Lazy Y," adapted from the novel of the same name, the cowboys, headed by Stewart on New Year's Day, staged a wild West rodeo at the big ranch along the sea near Santa Monica. One of the features of this was Stewart riding an outlaw mule, which he did regardless of the fact that the animal jumped off a cliff into a canyon. Neither the actor or animal were injured.

Director E. Mason Hopper will, in the subject he is now filming, introduce a new dramatic leading woman in the person of Claire Anderson, who was last week transferred from the Keystone Comedy Company to play under the direction of Hopper in a subject titled "John Warfield." Joe King will apear in the name part, and others of importance in the cast are Francis McDonald and Jean Hersholt.

Evart Overton and Corinne Griffith Are Co-Starred in Vitagraph's "The Menace"

Several new Keystone comedies were put in production last week by Albert Glassmire, who supervises this department of the Triangle studio. One of these is titled "A Good Elk," and has such well-known players as Joseph "Baldy" Belmont, Ruth Langston, Frank Bond and others in the cast.

Griffith Makes Interiors

Work on the interiors for the D. W. Griffith western front war picture continues at the Griffith studio in Hollywood, which was formerly known as the Fine Arts and recently vacated by the Triangle Keystone producing organization. At the present time it is thought it will require at least thirty days to complete the film, and therefore it wil not be on the market before March 1.

Chester Withey, who has been West for the past month, engaged by D. W. Griffith to direct another picture for him, will begin work within the next few days. Dorothy Gish is to be featured in the subject made by Withey, and George Fawcett will play one of the most important character parts. W. E. Keefe, who was formerly in charge of publicity for Mr. Griffith, has been engaged as assistant to Withey, and Carl Brown, who made many of the scenes of "Intolerance" and other Griffith subjects, will be in charge of the photography. No information has been given out as to the nature of this subject, nor with respect to the release.

All work on editing the big nine-reel subject of the National Film Corporation of America's spectacle, "Tarzan of the Apes," has been completed, and the laboratory force is now at work cutting the negative. This will be completed within a few days, and at that time Isadore Bernstein, who has been employed as assistant to General Manager and President William Parsons, will leave for New York to work with Mr. Parsons in the details of the initial presentation of the subject. With this work completed, Scott Sidney, the director, has been engaged by the Southern California Motion Picture Producing Company to direct Billie Rhodes in Strand-Mutual Featurettes, and is now working on "Her Wedding Day."

Chaplin Studio Ready

The Charlie Chaplin studio was receiving the finishing touches last week, and active production will be started within the next day or two. The stages—an open-air and a steel-and-glass-inclosed one—have been ready for some time, but production has been delayed for want of the necessary settings and peculiar equipment necessary for the making of such comedies as Chaplin will turn out for the First National Association.

Mr. Chaplin has engaged a staff of writers, which includes Charles Reisner, song writer and vaudeville actor; Melville Brown and Charles Lappworth, and the organization working with Mr. Chaplin now have four or five stories ready for production. The heads of the several departments for the Chaplin studio include John Jasper as manager, Frank Crompton, technical director; Roland Totheron, cameraman, and Carlyle Robinson, director of publicity. The only players so far engaged are Edna Purviance, who has played in more than a score of Chaplin comedies; Henry Bergman and Albert Austin, comedians.

Mr. Chaplin celebrated the birth of 1918 by giving a stag dinner to the heads of departments at Hotel Alexandria. A few minutes past twelve he was carried to the stage by a crowd of admirers and forced to make the welcome speech to the New Year. This he did in his usual modest and unassuming, yet highly entertaining, manner. Charles Reisner of the Chaplin party sang the patriotic song of which he is author, "Good-bye Broadway, Hello France," and others of the Chaplin dinner party gave numbers.

American Gets Busy

Activities of 1918 at the American studio at Santa Barbara were begun with two companies starting on new productions. Manager J. R. Crone has selected the complete cast for the next subject to be filmed by Lloyd Ingraham with Margarita Fischer in the principal role. The story is titled "Ann's Finish," and a majority of the scenes are laid about a fashionable or finishing school. The plot pertains to a burglar entering the room of the girl, and when caught by her begs for her assistance to escape. The matron entering at this time causes the girl to claim the burglar to be her husband. Several of the roles in this production are of the underworld type. The play is said to abound in comedy situations. Beatrice Van is author of the story and Elizabeth Mahoney prepared the screen version.

In "Extra! Extra!" the new Mary Miles Minter subject, the featured actress takes charge of a newspaper plant owned by her father when he is forced to retire because of pressure brought to bear by a political gang. Cast for this includes Alan Forrest, Harvey Clark, Clarence Burton, Lucille Ward, Emma Kluge, Perry Banks and Robert Miller. W. M. Ritchey is the author of this newspaper story, which is said to be based upon his actual experience.

Now that William Russell has left the American Company, Edward Sloman is enjoying the first vacation of any consequence since he began his screen career. It is planned that Sloman will, in the future, direct every other Mary Miles Minter production. Mr. Russell has gone East to complete negotiations for an engagement.

King-Bee Progresses

The few weeks the King-Bee Producing Organization, making Billy West Comedies has been on the coast, has enabled them to get ahead with productions, and they are now so well along that one film is being edited while the next subject is being photographed. Last week the coming release,

Without any sub-titles, "The Slave," with Billy West as chief funster, has been released by King Bee in two reels

"His Day Out," was forwarded to exchanges. It pertains to the experiences of West in and about a barber shop, and is said by Manager Louis Berstein to come within a close shave of being the funniest two-reeler this company has ever produced.

Director Arvid Gilstrom is now making a subject which will contain a number of thrills and the plot of the story is based on an automobile accident, which befalls the comedian, West. Owing to the illness of Miss Joy, ingenue of the company, Rosemary Theby is playing the lead opposite West in this picture.

Miss Grace Gershon, who has been associated with several West Coast producing companies, has been added to the King-Bee staff, serving as title editor. Miss Gershon will also look after publicity at the King Bee Studios.

Screen Examinations

Bringing Them Into a Close-Up

By Longacre

DESPITE the fact that "Wid's" expressed a lukewarm opinion of Select's "Ghosts of Yesterday," though condescendingly admitting that it is "pretty good," it gives us great pleasure to heartily indorse our own reviewer's opinion of it and re-echo praise of star, story and production rightfully accorded it in last week's issue of the NEWS. In its value as a piece of pictorial entertainment and in the merit of its setting, "Ghosts of Yesterday" so far transcends the usual run of feature pictures that it rightfully gains a place with the few pictures belonging with the "best" of the season.

Its box-office record is yet to be told, but if the writer were even a half-baked gambler, his odds would be on it to develop into a big commercial success—one that will attract and at the same time not disappoint. The larger of the two parts undertaken by Norma Talmadge was, if we may be permitted to suggest, extremely difficult to characterize. To register the change from the vain, pleasure-loving, profane Jeanne Le Fleur of the Paris cabaret to the sweet tenderness that approaches, though which is in no way similar, to her first role, that of Ruth, demanded the concentration of all Miss Talmadge's talents, particularly the application of the remarkable sense of character which the actress numbers among her accomplishments. Her work as an emotional actress has long held for her undisputed leadership of the stars of the screen and her latest effort is in no wise her least.

But in all other respects—in the support, the production and the good handling of Mr. Hughes' play—"Ghosts of Yesterday" is so meritorious that to acclaim it as both a commercial and artistic success is only moderate praise. The careful production given it by Charles Miller gives it a finishing polish that is admirable.

Speaking of artistic successes. Brandon Fuller, writing in the current issue of Photoplay Magazine, takes up the cudgels in behalf of the motion picture defending it against a foolish attack by Louis DeFoe, dramatic critic of the New York World. Mr. Fuller's article is interesting and more than amusing considering the embarrassment it must have caused Mr. DeFoe. But during the course of it he refers to "artistic successes" as "financial failures." This seems to be the prevailing idea but is, of course, all wrong. The term, artistic success, has by usage come to mean plays or pictures that are beautifully produced and enacted, but which do not take the public fancy. These, however, should be called artistic failures. An artistic success must of a necessity be a commercial success if it is a success at all. "The Ghosts of Yesterday" is a case in point. "The Birth of a Nation" was another, "Les Miserables" seems destined to be another. Artistic failures? Let them rest in peace.

Time was when the thought of William S. Hart doing anything romantic aside from holding up a stage coach, shooting up a bar room or beating the villain into a pulp was unheard of, or unseen. The romantic thread in his pictures was slight and Hart's prime emotion in the few scenes forming it was merely a setting together of the teeth and a watering of the eyes. But those who have seen his Artcraft efforts have discovered him to be quite the lover! Not a typical Romeo, to be sure, but in his clumsy expressions of love and admiration far from unromantic and always typical of his characters. Mr. Hart has typed himself with so few exceptions since his entrance into pictures that one might easily be led into the belief that versatility is not in its makeup. But it is. In "Wolves of the Rail" he further demonstrates this by showing a flash or two of comedy that gets over in fine style. It is to be hoped that his abilities along this line will not be totally neglected in future screen appearances.

The film world is shortly to witness the debut of two personalities whose callings have taken them into fields far removed from either screen or stage. Arthur Guy Empey, soldier, and Mary McLane, novelist. What Miss McLane in a picturization of her own sensational story, said to relate several of her love affairs, has to offer will be known shortly, for the picture is shown for review this week. It is more than probable that such a peculiar personality as hers will register on the screen with as much force as it did via type on the pages of a book.

As for Sergeant Empey, it is a foregone conclusion that his Vitagraph picture will reap a harvest of dollars, both for producer and exhibitor. The name of Empey, firstly because of his tremendously successful book, "Over the Top," and secondly because of his lectures in the various big centers of the country have become as oft-repeated household word as that of Billy Sunday when he was at the pinnacle of the publicity wave. Vastly interesting as a relator of the events of the battlefield, deeply stirring as a speaker, it remains to see what sort of an actor he will turn out to be. Backed by a cast of professionals and playing a role, the counterpart of which he has done in reality, he will have the best of assistance possible. One who has heard Empey lecture, who has been under the spell of his personal magnetism, said: "I can not for the moment conceive of Empey losing one whit of the eloquence that has made his personal appearances on the lecture platform such huge successes. A personality such as his can not be obscured merely because of the loss of the voice."

The advent of Toto, of Hippodrome fame, into Pathe comedies was something of an event. He has already proven himself a capable picture comedian and doubtless he will assimilate new tricks as time goes on. But even if he advanced none, the money invested in him by Pathe should make ample returns. Blessed with a name highly press agented about in New York, Chicago and one or two other big cities and with the added advantage of the publicity campaign planned for him by Pathe Exchange, his name, particularly catchy in its briefness, should shortly be as well known in the picture world as it is today in the field which Kolb and Dill refer to as the "speakies."

Someone remarked that Toto was little known outside of the big cities, because of the fact that the Hippodrome show, so monstrous, was unable to reach even the fair sized cities played by the less pretentious of stage productions. But this is the opinion of ignorance. Box office figures at the Hippodrome show a large and increasing percentage of out-of-town patrons. Visitors to New York number the Hippodrome along with the Statue of Liberty, Grant's Tomb, Fifth Avenue, the Art Museum and the other curiosities. In fact in many instances it comes ahead of them. They know the Statue of Liberty exists, but the Hippodrome must be seen. Word-of-mouth advertising is the result. With the consequence that when Toto comes to Cheyenne, Centerville or Whatnot he will be remenbered by some and very likely heard of by a good many more.

"Thais"

(Goldwyn—Five Reels)

Reviewed by R. E. Pritchard

PRESENTING a striking picture of life among the rich and pleasure-mad in ancient Alexandria, staged with a magnificence that has rarely been equalled in picture production, and featuring a star whose fame has spread to every part of the world, "Thais" promises to prove one of the greatest money makers for exhibitors that has been offered in months. Mary Garden has fulfilled every expectation, and Goldwyn Pictures Corporation has gone to the furthest limit to make "Thais" a true screen achievement.

Most screen presentations of great works are, unfortunately, disappointing. By some sort of psychology it seems that in the efforts of the various persons entering into the creation of the picture they have literally stepped on each other's toes in attempting to achieve the best; and there is a generally unsatisfactory result.

But in this case there has been such true harmony that one with sentimentality in his soul might believe that the spirit of the great opera from Anatole France's story entered into everyone connected with the picture. Certainly there has been no more truly artistic effect achieved in the net result than in this picture.

Most of the scenes are laid amidst the magnificence of Alexandria, and one shudders when he pauses to consider what the sets for this production must have cost. And the scenes in the desert and the huts of the Christians are equally convincing in their striking contrast of utter simplicity. As a matter of fact, this picture might well be called a picture of contrasts, for two more different figures that Thais, the idol of Alexandria, the queen of love and passion, and Paphnutius, who gives up wealth and the life of pleasure to join the Christians, and to convert Thais from her paths of wickedness so that those who worship her in the orgies of the earthly may follow her to the simple faith of Christianity.

There are many sensational elements to this picture that are bound to have their effect on the box office results. The magnificence of the sets, and the gowns worn by Miss Garden are little short of wonderful. One scene reveals the rich of Alexandria in their feasts that so many historians have described. At another time Miss Garden appears in the desert in a diaphanous garb that reveals every line of her form. And yet these scenes are so centered about the main story that there is no trace of the vulgar to them.

Miss Garden proves herself the same wonderful actress on the screen that made her fame in the opera. She expresses the varying emotions convincingly, and makes the character of Thais truly at one time a queen of worldly love, and at another the repentant daughter who is seeking happiness in Christianity.

From her work in this picture one feels sure that it is not necessary for her to follow in other operas for the screen, for she is today as great a picture success as any of the others who have been known in the silent drama for years. It would be unfair to pass the work of Miss Garden by without mentioning the wonderful dance which she executes in the opening scenes, and which alone is bound to create a wealth of word-of-mouth advertising.

There is a brilliant cast in her support, though the chief work falls to Hamilton Revelle as "Paphnutius," the noble who becomes a Christian. At times his work seems a little overdone, but one must bear in mind that earnestness was stamped upon those Christians of the earlier days. In the final scenes when he is overcome by his passionate love for Thais, he does some really great work. Craufurd Kent and Lionel Adams do the other two principal characters splendidly.

Goldwyn suggests a striking phrase in advertising this picture that it will do well for others to follow. It is "The Story of a Saint Who Became a Sinner and the Sinner Who Became a Saint." But possibly such suggestions are unnecessary, for hers is a picture with every advertising possibility. There are angles after angles that will back up this truly immense production.

It is suggested that here is an opportunity to bring people to motion picture theatres who have been prejudiced against them, and therefore managers should use this opportunity to arrange special effects wherever possible and to see that the other pictures on the program are up to the high standard.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Thais is the queen of love in Alexandria a dancer and courtesan. At one of her exhibitions Paphnutius (Hamilton Revelle), one of the richest young nobles of the city, becomes enamored of her, and with his friend, Lollius (Craufurd Kent), goes to call on her in her home of magnificence. But there the jealousy of Thais's present lover, Cynius (Lionel Adams), is aroused and after he has seen Paphnutius take Thais in his arms he seeks to kill him as the young noble leaves. He does wound him and is in turn killed. Paphnutius goes for treatment to one of the leaders of the Christians. He has already been converted to Christianity and was about to leave for the desert when he was held back by the charms of the courtesan. But now in his remorse and his terror at the tragedy in which he has had a part he flees across the desert to join the Christian colony. But there comes a call from Alexandria to him to come and convert Thais to the ways of the Lord and he yields. He gets into Thais' home by trickery of his friend. Then follows a duel between the two—of Thais trying to win the man back to the ways of the world and the man fighting for her soul. After one of the orgies of the rich is pictured and Paphnutius has pointed out to her all the sins and their results, she yields to him, burns her splendid belongings and goes, clad only in a thin white dress with him across the desert to the huts of the Christians, there to become a sister. Paphnutius is in his monastery far away. But Thais, in her recollections of the worldly pleasures of her former life determines to return and starts across the desert, drops exhausted and then with death near repents completely. But during the same moments Paphnutius has yielded to his one time passionate love for Thais and goes to seek her, only to find her dying and to kiss her with his heart again repentant.

"Jules of the Strong Heart"

(Lasky-Paramount—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

THERE are many things to justify the producers in the selection of "Jules of the Strongheart," a magazine story by William Merriam Rouse, for George Beban. Aside from offering the star a role thoroughly congenial to him the story called for lumber camp and forest scenes. These the company secured and not only do they lend realism to the picture but make it beautiful. Director Donald Crisp has introduced a storm effect, which, besides being excellently handled serves to heighten the strength of the plot coming as it does at a moment when the suspense registers a high water mark.

Mr. Beban's role offers him a number of scenes with a year-old infant. It is in this type of action that he shines best as a comedian and his well-known style of humor, as eccentric as his actions, is decidedly entertaining. Jules, the character Mr. Beban interprets, has a big appeal, not, it is true, by rights of the actor, but more by right of the part itself and the situations through which the author has piloted it. Particularly in the latter part has he directed sympathy toward the happy-go-lucky Jules, but save for the rather blood-curdling scene in which he is tortured by Burgess one can look at the photoplay dry-eyed. The fact is that "Jules of the Strongheart" is almost wholly a comedy when it comes to the work of the title character. But in other respects it is a serious subject. And while in the face of the picture's many merits it may be irrelevant to express the wish that Mr. Beban be presented in another part as in "An Alien" where his ability to awaken a deep appeal may have full play, the desire forces itself to the surface.

However, of its kind, "Jules of the Strongheart" is so worthy that it can be heartily recommended as a comedy-drama. Harvey F. Thew and Frank Finnegan in the handling of the scenario have gotten the most from the story. Helen Eddy, Charles Ogle, Raymond Hatton and Guy Oliver appear in parts of prominence and render adequate assistance to the star.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Jules Lemaire (George Beban), a French-Canadian, arrives in a lumber camp with a baby, the identity of which he is loathe to reveal. He is given employment. He shortly falls in love with Joy (Helen Eddy), daughter of Farnsworth (Charles Ogle), boss of the camp, but Burgess (Guy Oliver), the camp bully, puts a stop to this by informing the girl that Jules has deserted a wife. The lumbermen, having heard a rumor to the effect that the company employing them is bankrupt, grow dangerous. On the night the pay roll is due to arrive there is a terrific storm. Jules volunteers to get the money from across the lake and Burgess accompanies him. While on the water Burgess strikes Jules on the head, stunning him, and attempts to find the order for the money. He is unsuccessful and morning finds Jules tied to stakes on the shore being unmercifully treated by Burgess, who demands the order. He is finally rescued by Joy and Liggitt (Ernest Joy), father of the baby, whose story places Jules back in Joy's good graces.

H. B. Carpenter and Edward Martin complete the cast.

"The Cloven Tongue"

(Russian Art Film-Pathe—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

PATHE'S latest release of the Russian Art Films entitled "The Cloven Tongue" makes an average picture. It deals with the mistress of a small land owner of Russia and his daughter. The former has exerted her evil influence over the man until he has little say in the manipulation of the affairs of his estate. It remains for the daughter to counteract this influence which she finally succeeds in doing. Her love affair with the Prince which the other woman tries so hard to blast creates an additional interest.

Unlike the former product of the Russian Art Films already released, the majority of the scenes in "The Cloven Tongue" are exteriors. They are rural locations most of them, beautiful, and well photographed.

The cast does commendable work throughout and the direction is satisfactory.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Nicolai Orloff (N. V. Panoff), a horse dealer is swayed in the management of all his affairs by his selfish mistress, Glasha (Nadya Lesienka). His daughter Sonia (Sophie Karabana), returning from school, discovers the other woman strangely antagonistic toward her particularly when she meets and falls in love with Prince Alexis. Desiring the prince herself, Glasha prevails upon Orloff to forbid his daughter continuing her romance with him. Later Glasha disappears and the prince is accused of murdering her. It develops in the end, however, that she was killed by enraged peasant women who objected to the harsh treatment accorded them by Orloff, who they knew was influenced by Glasha.

"The City of Purple Dreams"

(William N. Selig—Seven Reels)

Reviewed by Joseph L. Kelley

"THE CITY OF PURPLE DREAMS" adapted from the book of the same title, by Edwin Baird, was produced by William N. Selig, under the direction of Colin Campbell. The production is in seven reels and distributed on the open market by Exhibitors' Operating Corporation. Thomas Santschi, Bessie Eyton and Fritzi Brunnette present the principal roles. The melodramatic stands out prominently in the latter reels, the first reels revealing the tragedy and pathos in the life of a derelict. Because of the human note that is sounded throughout the run of this photoplay, the tense situations that develop and the strength of character that takes a human derelict from the streets and places him among the successful financiers of the age, this screen version should be received by the patrons of both the big and little houses as one offering entertainment of the best class.

There is no pretense at the spectacular nor does the production offer the unusual in its manner of presentation. Director Campbell had a script offering intense melodrama, opportunity for the development of pathos, a strain of love and the tragic and these qualities have been brought out strong by a capable cast of players. The seven reels are devoted to the exposition of one of the tragedies of a human life. All can understand and some will find in its exposition exact duplications in the lives of some they have known. It is this natural trend that is taken and the consequent human touch that is felt, that both impresses and convinces. The story is told in silent drama as one person would tell another—without artificiality, without the glamour of spectacle or the unnaturalness of development. The events which take place have marked the life of many a man. This is why "The City of Purple Dreams" should prove of interest to all who have arrived at the age of discretion. The children will not appreciate the lesson which it teaches nor will they comprehend its more subtle moments but they will enjoy it for the same reason that they enjoy tales of heroism and marvel at the exploits of the bandit.

Thomas Santchi's characterization of the derelict is of the best brand. He is criticized, however, for his facial make-up. In the early scenes the beard and tattered clothes are the only evidence of the derelict they cover. The facial make-up might have been worn by a matinee idol who suddenly had occasion to affix a false beard. Fritzi Brunnette is given first honors for the work in the feminine roles. Bessie Eyton has little to do but does that little with appreciation.

"Face Value"

(Bluebird—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Joseph L. Kelley

MAE MURRAY dons the rags of the waif and the finery of the elite in her latest work for Bluebird and interprets the two extremes in impersonations with all the assurance of a little general. Her finished acting is the predominating note of this production and it rings with true harmony throughout the time she works before the camera. "Face Value" was written by Miss Murray in collaboration with Robert Z. Leonard, the director. The scenario was done by Fred Myton.

The story is divided into two main episodes, the opening reels presented in the nature of a prologue. It is in the prologue that Miss Murray does her best work—the characterization of a street waif. So realistic is her portrayal of the waif and such a marked change takes place in her social elevation, that it is difficult to reconcile the Miss Murray of the prologue with the Miss Murray of the main story. She presents the one, forgets it—the other is taken up and put over with a bang—all of which speaks in the highest terms of her ability and versatility as an interpreter of personalities.

The action of the story would have been quickened and presented with greater force of conviction had the scenes in the prologue been shortened. The main theme has been developed with one or two far-fetched situations to retain the fundamental idea. This fact detracts a bit from the strength of the plot. Miss Murray and Director Leonard have fashioned a story that smacks of the human element throughout, and this will sufficiently counteract the impression left by the one or two situations mentioned above, as to shadow the weaker situations.

The scene revealing the taking of the necklace by Naquire is the most obvious example of the far-fetched situations. A crook, supposed to be as nimble with his fingers and as cunning of brain as Naquire would not take the chance that Naquire took in this scene, and it is a safe wager that he would not have left the room undetected.

Director Leonard has fashioned a good production. His work in staging the prologue has been presented with appreciation for the average slum district. The atmosphere is there. When he gets into the main story he has used equally as good judgment. As co-author and director, Mr. Leonard gives a good account of his stewardship in directing the destinies of "Face Value."

Casson Ferguson presents the role of a tough guy in realistic fashion but wavers a bit when he is seen in evening clothes. He is a bit too effective as a gentleman burglar. Wheeler Oakman gives a good performance. Clarissa Selwynne and Florence Carpenter are seen to good advantage in minor roles.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Joan Darby (Mae Murray) is a street waif, who has been taken into the home of a washwoman. She knows nothing of her parentage, and spends most of her time when not delivering laundry in the streets. Louis Patrick Naquire (Casson Ferguson) is the leader of a gang of ruffians. His gang is opposed to one led by a negro. Joan comes upon them wrangling, and suggest that they decide all questions in the prize ring. She has read in the papers of the big sums given to prize fighters for bouts.

Naquire and the opposing leader agree, Joan to receive half of the receipts. She intends to buy a gown, and the total receipts are barely sufficient. She takes it all and makes a hurried exit. She leaves her home with the washwoman and goes to the city, obtains a position as stenographer and is contented. Naquire comes into her life, and threatens to expose her unless she assists him in a hold-up he has planned. Joan agrees, is detected and sentenced to the reformatory. En route she leaps from the train, and is rescued by Bertram Van Twiller, a wealthy young man. He takes her to his mother's home, and she is given fine clothes and introduced to society. The Van Twillers give a grand ball, and Naquire reading of the event decides to be present, and relieve the guests of their jewels. He is surprised to find Joan, and after he has taken the necklace belonging to one of the guests he makes her conceal it. Later he is detected, and Joan is exonerated of all wrong.

"The Hidden Hand"

THE big thrill in the eighth episode of the serial entitled "The Slide for Life," shows the spectacular manner in which Ramsey and Doris escape from the Hidden Hand and his henchmen. Pursued they arrive at the brink of a yawning chasm, across which stretches a cable, the further end reaching the opposite bank at considerably lower level. Ramsey snaps on his handcuffs over the cable and with Doris clinging to him they slide to safety. Immediately after this another thrill is registered when one of the Hidden Hand's band, attempting to follow, is shot by Ramsey and falls into the stream many feet below. The previous action of the episode is filled with the same type of incident which is yet gaining popularity for the serial.

The ninth episode "Jets of Flame," is staged for the most part on the water front. Chasing, fights and hair-raising escapes are present in aplenty, while perhaps the most important incident in connection with the progress of the plot is the death of the Hidden Hand. However, as serial villains have as many lives as tradition is wont to allot a cat, it will not be at all surprising if he comes back to the land of the living. At any rate conjectures as to his probable fate will cause the tenth episode to be awaited with more than usual interest.

"The Flames of Chance"

(Triangle—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

THE magazine story by Francis Sullivan upon which "The Flames of Chance" is based, revolves around a little incident of the world war, exceedingly rich from the standpoint of human interest and containing not a little pleasing humor. But like the previous Triangle picture, "The Gown of Destiny," this, its current offering, with the monstrous struggle as a dim and distant background, is totally free from the horrors of the battlefield. The girl, Jeanette, adopts three soldiers of the Allies as God-sons and, when writing to them, pictures herself as old and gray and rheumatic. When one of them, Harry Ledyard, is invalided home, she must perforce assume this false part in reality and consequently she dons a flowing black gown, wig, spectacles and hobbles around with a cane. From this point the romance of Jeanette and Harry is developed delightfully by Mr. Sullivan. Jeanette, of course, falls in love with her God-son and the ancient raiment soon begins to aggravate her and Harry, though his eyes tell him that Jeanette is old, is more inclined to follow the dictates of his heart and holds for her the love of youth.

The counter-plot with the German spy not revealed in his true colors until the final reel, furnishes an element of suspense which contrasts favorably with the main line of action. Harvey Gates and Elizabeth Haas provided an excellent continuity from Mr. Sullivan's story and Raymond Wells followed on with a production that meets all requirements.

Margery Wilson as Jeanette makes an attractive heroine and in makeup as an old woman, plays with a sense of humor that is charming. Jack Mulhall is a pleasing Harry, while Anna Dodge and Wilbur Higby interpret character parts to good advantage.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Jeanette (Margery Wilson) stenographer in an advertising agency operated by Armstrong (Wilbur Higby), through the Red Cross adopts Harry Ledyard (Jack Mulhall), an American soldier in the foreign legion and his comrades in arms (Eugene Corey and Lee Phelps) as God-sons. She sends them packages of good things and letters, the while posing as an extremely aged woman. When Harry returns from the war, Jeannette dresses herself up to make good her bluff and entertains Harry. She soon falls in love with him, particularly as he is more than attentive to her. She still continues her correspondence with the other soldiers but one day the censors discover one of her letters to contain a code message to the Germans. Accused of being a spy, Harry, to protect her, takes the blame, but in the offices of the secret service the guilt is placed on Armstrong and by a trick he is forced into a confession. Harry's discovery that Jeanette is in reality a young woman brings around a complete happy ending.

Percy Challenger and Ben Lewis are others in the supporting cast.

"Evidence"

(Triangle—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

ON the premise that "any man of wealth and influence can commit murder and then get off if he hires a competent counsel," Jack Cunningham, author of "Evidence," has constructed a most absorbing photoplay. It can easily be recollected that the basis of Mr. Cunningham's story contains more of fact than of fiction. The force of it is driven home when, Corbin, the murderer, after a short stay in the insane asylum after his trial, is a free man, while two misguided hall boys, convicted of stealing, are sent to prison for a twenty-year sentence. While this comparison is only mentioned in passing and not made the final issue of the story, it registers with more than slight significance.

Indeed though "Evidence" is built from the premise mentioned, another line of action claims the climax of the picture. Corbin has murdered his wife because of her unfaithfulness. And even while realizing that Dr. Hyde is the other man in question he refrains from exacting vengeance in this quarter also because his son is to marry Hyde's daughter. But which ever of the two aims of the author, certain injustices of the law or Corbin's ultimate self-sacrificing and unselfish silence, outstand in the mind of the spectator, "Evidence" is bound to make engrossing entertainment.

For Mr. Cunningham, in the development of his scenario, has created a surprising amount of suspense and mystery at the very outset. This results from the planting of the murder and the robbery, but, through a contrivance in the mechanics of the scenario, this planting serves the other and more dominant purpose of arousing immediate interest, interest which never subsides until the final scene. Subsequent to the murder and the clearing up of the mystery surrounding the action of the hall boys, the suspense is still upheld by Corbin and his knowledge of the identity of the man who violated his hearth. Walter Edwards has presented the picture in entirely creditable style.

J. Barney Sherry is featured. He takes the role of Corbin and plays it well. Pauline Starke is as clever as ever in the part of Wyllis Hyde and the support does consistently good work.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

John Corbin (J. Barney Sherry), prominent attorney, returning to his home unexpectedly, discovers a man departing by the window. The attitude of his wife (Audelle Higgins) confirms his suspicions as to the why and wherefore of the visitor and he deliberately kills her. Giving himself up he declines to state the cause of his crime when he thinks of the engagement of his son (Eugene Corey) to Wyllis Hyde (Pauline Starke), daughter of Dr. Hyde (Howard Davis), the man he suspects of visiting his wife on the night of the murder. Corbin's attorneys enter a plea of temporary insanity at the trial and he is acquitted and only consigned to a sanitarium for the criminal insane for a short while. He is released in time to attend his son's wedding and for his sake refrains from accusing Hyde of the crime he knows for a certainty he committed.

"Phantom Fame"

"PHANTOM FAME" is the first number in an eight-reel series to be released by Pathe under the general title of "The Price of Folly." It was produced at the Horkheimer Studios in California and features Ruth Roland. As in the "Who Pays?" series the various episodes are complete in themselves; each contains a different story, but based on the same theme as indicated by the title.

The story of "Phantom Fame" is melodrama and has as its central figure a married woman who sets out on a literary career. It is her misfortune to come in contact with a newspaper editor and magazine owner who makes a regulated business of seducing young women. In his clutches Kate Denton, the literary aspirant, struggles until rescued by her husband and a man whose daughter was betrayed by the villain.

This plot makes actionful two reels. It is extremely rapid in development and several of its situations bespeak a most imaginative scenario writer. It is done after the manner of the "Who Pays?" and "The Neglected Wife" series, both featuring the same star and produced at the same studios and will appeal to the same type of audience. Miss Roland has been surrounded by a supporting cast, which, to say the least, is appreciative of the story's possibilities.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Kate Denton (Ruth Roland), angered at the opposition of her husband (Frank Mayo) when she announces her intention of taking up a literary career, leaves his house and journeys to the city. There she meets Arnold (Lake McKee), an editor and magazine owner of shady character. He has just rid himself, by a trick, of a girl who sought to marry him when Kate enters. He gives her a position on his newspaper. She is sent to cover a dinner given by her employer, and not until then does she see the trap set for her. Denton and the father of the wronged girl arrive just in time to save her from his clutches.

Bruce Smith, Jimsy Maye and Neal Hardin complete the cast.

"The Kitchen Lady"

(Paramount-Mack Sennett—Two Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

"THE KITCHEN LADY" may be depended upon to create an uproar in any house, as can practically all the Sennett comedies, but the manner in which the laughs are secured is strikingly unusual in these two reels which bear Eddie Cline's name as director. While the work of Slim Summerville, Louise Fazenda and Glen Cavender is undoubtedly praiseworthy, the chief objects of attention in "The Kitchen Lady" are a bear, a goat, a cat and a fish. Rather a queer assortment for comedy leads, but some slight idea of the fun can be gained by relating the scene in which the goat treats Louise unkindly after the usual fashion of goats, the fact that the cat after having her tail nipped by the fish expresses horror at the bear with a fine sense of facial expression, and the series of flashes in which Glen quite against his own will, does a wild and furious dance with the bear.

To make the animals do the right thing at the right time must have required the greatest pains in the directing. An audience is going to appreciate this and "The Kitchen Lady" besides making all who see it laugh, will set them talking about it. Mr. Cline's genius for creating comedy gags and utilizing them at the right moment was never so apparent as in this release while the entire picture bears the superlative distinctiveness common only in Mack Sennett's product.

Miss Fazenda works in an eccentric part, that of a slavey and works successfully while Summerville is as ridiculously funny as ever. Alice Maison and Eva Thatcher handle other important roles in the unwinding of the comedy in fine style.

"The Beautiful Mrs. Reynolds"

(World Film—Six Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

THE historic rivalry of Alexander Hamilton and Aaron Burr, two of the most brilliant statesmen of the first years of the American Republic, told in interesting episodes by Sam Weller, is offered in "The Beautiful Mrs. Reynolds." The skeleton in Hamilton's cupboard when uncovered makes ideal photodramatic material with the celebrated Secretary of the Treasury himself as the central and most sympathetic figure. His career from the time of his first meeting with Burr, the development of the enmity of one toward the other which ultimately resulted in the duel ending Hamilton's life, is traced in a number of episodes that entertain both because of their close relation to early American history and because of the numerous moments of drama which they supply.

The fly in Hamilton's ointment was his infatuation for Mrs. Reynolds, a lady who, though she possessed two scheming husbands, loved the statesman dearly. After his discovery of the plot hatched by the two villains and carried through by Burr, Hamilton's public confession of his relations with Mrs. Reynolds placed him once more in high favor throughout the country, so firmly so, in fact, that he caused the defeat of Burr in a close election. From this point events lead rapidly to the famous duel in which Burr killed Hamilton, with the result that his own career in politics was forever after ended.

Arthur Ashley transferred Mr. Weller's scenario to the screen and has furnished a production of commendable quality. The uniforms and costumes of the Revolutionary period lend added color to the picture. Mr. Ashley also gives a good account of himself as Burr and Carlyle Blackwell is seen to advantage as Hamilton. June Elvidge in the title-role and Evelyn Greely as Margaret Moncrieffe, the English girl over whom the antagonism of Hamilton and Burr is born, are the other featured players. A large supporting cast made up for the most part of regular members of the World Film stock interpret the various historic characters who have roles of more or less importance in the picture to its general advantage.

"The Beautiful Mrs. Reynolds," because of its historic angle, which opens big possibilities in advertising, and its merit as a picture production, should prove an above-the-average asset for the screen of any picture house.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

In the latter part of the Revolution, Aaron Burr (Arthur Ashley) meets Margaret Moncrieffe (Evelyn Greely), and because Alexander Hamilton (Carlyle Blackwell) is partly responsible for his designs on the girl being defeated, there springs a deep hatred between them. Years later when Hamilton is Secretary of the Treasury, he meets Mrs. Reynolds (June Elvidge) and is strongly attracted by her. Through her husband (Carl Girard) and his partner in crime, Clingman (Hubert Wilke), Burr discovers this relationship and securing letters which Hamilton wrote to Mrs. Reynolds, places them in the hands of his political enemies with results that come near being disastrous for the secretary. He, however, rises in favor when he makes a bold and fearless confession to all the charges made against him. He enters the campaign against Burr and prevents his election. It is this which ultimately leads to the duel and to Hamilton's death.

Pinna Nesbit as Mrs. Hamilton, George MacQuarrie as George Washington, Rose Tapley as Martha Washington, Alec Francis as General Philip Schuyer and Lionel Belmore as General Putnam have parts of importance in one episode or another, while others in the cast are Betty Peterson, Justine Cutting, Albert Hart, Jack Drumier, Charles Brandt, Henry West, Florence Beresford, William Black, Margaret Gale, Lottie Ford, Robert Forsyth, John Smiley, William Miller, Herbert Barrington, Anthony Bird, John Jenkins, Attilio Corbell and Madeline Barrett.

(Artcraft—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

"ROSE OF THE WORLD," in which Elsie Ferguson makes her third appearance on the Aircraft program, is an adaptation made by Charles Maigne from the novel by Agnes and Edgerton Castle and directed by Maurice Tourneur. Miss Ferguson's rendition of the part of Rosamond English, the woman who believes her husband dead and so marries again, is done with as much feeling and emotional depth as marked her previous performances. But "Rose of the World," aside from Miss Ferguson's performance and the finished work apparent in all of Mr. Tourneur's productions, is rather disappointing.

It starts out well with Captain English's departure for the front in India, his reported death, and the marriage of Rosamond, his wife, to Sir Arthur Gerardine, a man several years her senior. A premonition that the unexpected is ever about to happen grips the observer during Rosamond's awakening to the fact that she loved Captain English more than she ever realized during his stay with her. This part of the film raises suspense to an enormously high degree and paves the way for a climax which one has the right to expect to be of a power in proportion to the body of the film. But to our notion the story fails at this point. There is some Hindu mysticism worked in for effect, and Captain English reappears on the scene, his presence serving to restore Rosamond's brain, disordered from her constant brooking, to its natural state.

This ends "The Rose of the World," and one is left with his brain in something of a whirl. All the art applied by star, director and scenario writer to bring out the high lights of the main portion of the picture fails to make more of the climax than an ending peculiarly weak for the type of story it ends.

Wyndham Standing as Captain English, Clarence Handysides as Sir Arthur, and June Sloane as his niece lend competent support to the star. Mr. Tourneur's direction is superlative, as always.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

In India, Rosamond English (Elsie Ferguson) learns that her husband, Captain Harry (Wyndham Standing) has fallen in battle. After a time she marries Sir Arthur Gerardine (Clarence Handysides), but is unhappy. She keeps dwelling on the memory of her former husband and gradually her love for him is kindled with renewed vigor, particularly when she contrasts him with Sir Arthur, older, pompous and too masterly. She retires to England to aid Lieutenant Bethune (Percy Marmount) in writing a biography of Captain English, but this only serves to increase her mental anguish. Sir Arthur arrives and notices a great change in her. After spending a day reading Captain Harry's diary, in which he remarked that food and water were scarce, she comes to the dinner table terribly distracted. The sight of the plentiful supply of food and water completely upsets her. She is confined to her bed suffering from a mental disorder. In her delirium she requests her Indian servant to pray for Captain Harry's return and the prayer is answered—for Sir Arthur's Indian secretary was none other than the officer in disguise. His presence completely heals Rosamond and Sir Arthur departs.

Ethel Martin, Marie Benedetta, Gertrude Le Brant and Sloane De Masber have other important parts.

"Madam Who"

(Paralta-W. W. Hodkinson, Inc.—Seven Reels)

REGINALD BARKER has transferred to the screen Monte Katterjohn's dramatic version of Harold MacGrath's novel, "Madam Who," with a resounding punch in every scene that goes to make seven reels of that brand of entertainment which prompts the patron to look up the management on his or her way out and congratulate him on his wise choice. Harold MacGrath created an embryo drama; Monte Katterjohn nursed the infant to majority, Director Barker took the matured product and with the most capable assistance of Bessie Barriscale and cast, prepared the youngster for its initial bow to the public. The bow is taken so graciously and with such a fine degree of poise and dramatic intent, that even the hardened "first-nighter" will forget himself and applaud out of order. The exhibitor who does not book this feature may not lose, but if he does book it he is sure to win.

When it is announced that the author's work confines itself solely with the revelation of historical facts concerning the events occurring during the Civil War, it will be doubted by many that such a dramatic presentment can be made without arousing the old fires of antagonism which existed between the North and South. No such doubt should exist. The play is presented without prejudice, and because of the absence of actual war scenes excepting the mob scenes depicting the evacuation of Richmond, there is not offered this opportunity to either the North or the South.

"Madam Who," although telling of the Civil War times, is not a war drama. It speaks, rather, of the social side of the war, not of actual warfare. The locale of the story is laid in the South and Washington. The heroine is a Southern girl who takes it upon herself to avenge the death of her father and brother. To this end she enlists her services as a secret service agent. There is mystery prominent throughout the run and action takes the whip-hand. The dramatic element is a prominent figure, with the result that your attention is attracted and held to the screen. An uncertainty which arises concerning the identity of the characters is due to the fact that the author has left a bit too many details to the imagination of the audience. A sub-title or a more clear exposition through the introduction of more detail would have cleared certain situations. But the fact that the audience is made to use the imagination is sometimes a big advantage—depending upon the intelligence of the audience.

The quality of the production which "Madam Who" has been given by Paralta under the direction of Mr. Barker is commendable. It speaks of careful consideration for atmosphere, historical accuracy and a true sense of dramatic appreciation. Mr. Barker did not have a simple script from which to work. The complications aroused by the author called for exactness on the part of the creator for screen presentation. These facts were appreciated by the director and he looked before he leaped. His careful decisions in the matter are evidenced throughout the run. Mr. Katterjohn made the way straight.

Miss Barriscale reaches the high spots. She is the demure little Southerner and the revengeful daughter of the South—handling both situations and character with the ability of a born artist. She gets the spirit of the occasion and holds it throughout. Edward Coxen as the Northerner who falls in love with Jeanne is a fine type, and presents his part in a convincing manner. Howard Hickman has a difficult role, but this fact does not prevent his giving his usual fine performance.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Jeanne Beaufort (Bessie Barriscale) is a Southerner and seeks revenge for the death of her father and brother. She volunteers her services as a spy and secret service agent in the cause of the South.

In her endeavor to capture a gang of spies working in the interest of the North, she is captured and compelled to marry one of the gang—who is masked. She notices a peculiar tattoo mark on the man's wrist. This is the only mark of identity. She escapes and begins the search for the man she was compelled to marry. Henry Morgan (Howard Hickman) is a Southern officer and works with Jeanne to run down the spies. John Armitage (Edward Coxen) is one of the gang who is working in the South in the interest of the North. In her search for the man whom she had married, Jeanne discovers the peculiar mark on the wrists of several men with whom she comes in contact on her visit to Washington to get certain important papers. She succeeds in getting the papers and the Northerner from whom she steals them kills himself rather than suffer the disgrace of having lost them. Jeanne is suspected but succeeds in reaching her home in the South. Armitage comes to Richmond as a Northern spy. She met him at a social affair while in Washington. She loves him but realizes that she cannot marry him because he is a Northerner. Later Grant takes Richmond, is attacked, and the citizens hurriedly leave. Jeanne refuses to give up the cause. Armitage is leading a company of sildiers attacking Jeanne's home. He sees her and prevents his men from using violence. After the war he and Jeanne forget differences and are married.

"The Birth of Democracy"

(Export and Import—Seven Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

THE reign of terror instituted by Robespierre, subsequent to the overthrow of the Louis of France, out of which rose the foundation of French democracy is the basis of "The Birth of Democracy," a seven-part feature produced in Europe by the Franco-American Film Company and released in this country by the Export and Import organization. While an intimate and at times highly entertaining personal story runs through the length of the picture, its chief reason for existence is its spectacular effects. The mob scenes of the revolutionary days are pictures done by a master-director. The thousands of people seen surging about the carts carrying their victims to the guillotine and storming the palaces and prisons perform with a realism no less than that existing in reality.

The personal story which traces the activities of Countess Fontnai, arch-enemy of Robespierre showing the manner in which she pulled the strings which either directly or indirectly resulted in his ultimate downfall, and in which also is developed her love affair with Jean Guery and the tremendous sacrifice she makes in his behalf, is given considerable prominence. In its introduction the elaborate costumes of its principals may cause some slight confusion, but this at most will be the only momentary. The story is entertaining and toward the end reaches a point of suspense of power. Its development through all its stages is not, however, of the best. It deals only with its own high lights, skipping from one to another, with little intermediary action to bring out its lesser but no less dramatically important points.

Lyda Borelli as Countess Fontnai shows some clever work and is ever an attractive figure. M. Fabiani as Robespierre, M. Novelli as Tallien, the plotter, and M. Barny as Jean Guery, lover of the Countess, all give highly creditable accounts of themselves. The photography is commendable and the settings provided true to the period. The subtitles are well written and fully descriptive.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

At the outbreak of the French Revolution, Robespierre (M. Fabiani) seizes the reigns of the much-harassed government and institutes a reign of terror, fatal to all who were in favor with the latter kings of France. Tallien (M. Novelli), once a poor journalist, becomes his right-hand man and is sent to a quarter of France to quell royalist uprisings. These are headed by Jean Guery (M. Barny), known as the "Unseizable," lover of the Countess Fontnai (Lyda Borelli). Tallien's instructions are to capture Guery at all costs, but through the quick wit of the Countess the "Unseizable" escapes. Tallien comes completely under the power of the Countess and as a result is so favorably inclined toward the royalists that he incurs the enmity of Robespierre. He is summoned to Paris and removed from power. Guery, finally captured, is sentenced to die on the guillotine. The Countess pleads with Tallien to effect his rescue. With the promise that she will marry him providing he is successful, Tallien rallies his friends around him and rises in revolt against Robespierre. The revolt is a success and Robespierre dies on the guillotine. With her lover free, the Countess fulfills her promise to Tallien.

"The Wild Strain"

(Vitagraph—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Joseph L. Kelley

VITAGRAPH'S "The Wild Strain" is a photodramatic version of George Randolph Chester and Lillian Chester's story of the same title. The production was made by Vitagraph's Western company under the direction of William Wolbert. Nell Shipman after a long absence is re-introduced by Vitagraph in the featured feminine role. Alfred Whitman presents the featured male role. The production will stand as an average five-reel feature, never reaching the high spots in dramatics or develping situations that incite more than an average interest.

The authors have relied upon the fact that a long line of ancestors are responsible for "the wild strain" in the heroine, and the manner in which they have developed the theme has led them into the paths of fancy rather than sound reasoning. After planting the characters, and after Director Wolbert has devoted much reelage to impressing upon the minds of the audience, the fact that the heroine is influenced by her ancestors by continued flashbacks to their portraits on the wall, the heroine gives the first evidence of "the wild strain" by mounting a stray circus horse which appears on the scene, riding it back to the circus grounds and giving an exhibition of bare-back riding before the assembled audience. For a girl who had been under the guidance of most severe parents, the heroine gives an exhibition of riding that would put an old-time circus performer to shame.

Throughout the story there runs the unnatural. An audience is given the impression from the start, that they might expect most anything in the way of far-fetched situations. To those who enjoy the incidents in life which are the exceptions rather than the rule, this picture will hold a certain appeal. But to those who insist upon seeing life as it is actually lived and who desire to see the fact rather than the fancy developed, "The Wild Strain" will hold only a passing interest.

Nell Shipman gives an average performance. She is handicapped from the start with a weak, unsympathetic role. Alfred Whitman is under the same disadvantage. Otto Lederer, Mrs. Buskirk, Ed Alexander, Mrs. Ruth Handforth and R. Bradbury do what they can to convince when this is impossible. With a poor story to work from, nothing better than a good try could be expected from Director Wolbert. The photography is clear and up to the present-day standard.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Winifred Hollywood (Nell Shipman) is in love with Harold Burton (Alfred Whitman). The Burtons are invited to the home of the Hollywoods for "inspection." The Hollywoods are proud of their ancestry and the father and mother hold dominant sway over their daughter, Winifred, who has inherited "the wild strain." Kingsley Royce (Ed. Alexander) pays a visit to the Hollywood home and insists upon Winifred doing the latest dances with him. The parents of both Winifred and Harold are shocked. Winifred and Kingsley leave the party for a stroll and come upon an escaped circus horse. Winifred catches the horse and rides it back to the circus, where she is engaged to take the part of the bare-back rider, who is sick. She gives an exhibition and makes a hit with the audience. When she returns home she meets a most aggravated mother and father. The Burtons decide that Winifred will not make a suitable wife for Harold.

Harold is employed in a bank and Royce, who is in need of money, and a friend of the vice-president, persuades the vice-president to accept his note for a large sum. The note falls due and he cannot meet it. Royce persuades his friend, the vice-president, to make it possible for a hired gangster to rob the safe.

Winifred is again imbued with the "wild strain" and leaves at night for a ride. Harold is told by a neighbor that she was seen leaving her home. He follows. Winifred comes upon the gangsters discussing the contemplated robbery. Harold invokes the aid of Colonel Bull, the circus owner. The robbers are caught and the bank robbery averted. Harold is the hero and he and Winifred are married, returning to her home, preceded by the circus parade.

Passing an Idea Along

"HONESTY among thieves" is said to be one of the fundamental rules in that trade. No matter how crooked a man of the profession may be with the populace, when he strikes one of his own kind he is warmed with ethical ideas and radiates honesty. It may be because the "pal" has "something on him" and he knows that a misstep means "ruin." There is no doubt that exhibitors and operators feel like outsiders and do not know whom to trust and therefore go without many things which could be sold to them and which they need were the offerings made honestly.

"Exploiting the exhibitor" is a common phrase—it is an acknowledged fact. They are the people who allow dealers and exchanges to make a profit. Who is treating them squarely and who is not is a hard matter to decide, for in the main it depends upon the standards of the man in charge of making the particular sale in the locality.

My attention has been called lately to certain exchange conditions where exhibitors sign a contract for a certain film, subject to acceptance at the home office. The salesman goes around the corner—flourishes the contract in the face of another exhibitor and finally convinces him that he should pay more than his competitor. This is not a method which tends to stabilize film rentals or the industry.

Do we blame the salesman for getting all he can for his goods? No, but it must be done honestly and not through an "acceptance" look hole. If he allows the exhibitor to sign the contract it should stand, as he should be considered the authorized agent of the company and he should not be allowed by the company to show this contract to a competitor of the man who has honestly signed for the film.

This bartering shakes any feeling of confidence which the exhibitor may have had in the exchange or in any other man selling him goods. He has been "exploited" again and his feeling of distrust is deepened. He says no one in the industry is honest. If it were possible to judge all by this experience he would be correct, but we are glad to say that all salesmen are not as crooked as this illustration might lead one to believe. They are graded from this up to those who sell a man for as much as the law will allow—sign him up and then deliver the goods.

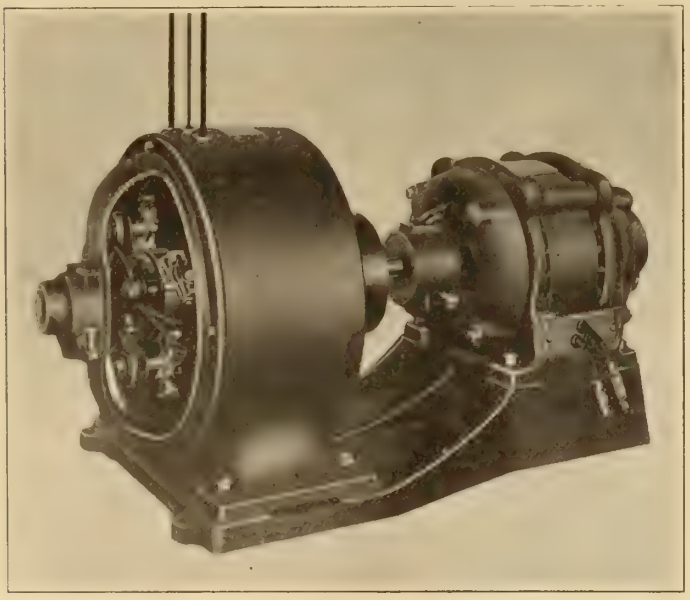
Some of the equipment people are just as bad except that they do not even trust each other. Their code of ethics is different again, for not only do they want to "exploit" the exhibitor but actually cut each other's throat, often, however, to the benefit of the exhibitor.

The manufacturer himself is also in a bad way. One once told me, "Well I can afford to sell at this cheap rate better than ——— (naming a competitor) as my credit will hold out longer than his." All the time these two companies were covering the country with apparatus at next to no profit and killing off prospects which should have meant good returns to both, had the prices been at a figure comparable with the increasing costs of raw material and increasing salaries in their sales organizations.

They authorize their salesmen to sell at one discount to one man and another discount to another. Suspicion is again aroused and once more the purchaser does not know where he stands.

Our attention has been called to people who circularize the exhibitors and make statements and promises on which they can not make good. They say we sell certain commodities which will do certain definite things which standard and tested goods will do, but when delivery is made it is found that these commodities are not as represented. When the reason for the purchase is sought, it is found that it was because the sale was made at a price a few cents or dollars less than the price of the reputable goods the quality of which is known—"A penny wise and a pound foolish." Here is where Mr. Exhibitor "exploited" himself. He should buy goods the quality of which is known or the manufacturer of which has a reputation for honest production. Merchandise described as "just as good as" seldom stands the test, and goods bought on this basis were never satisfactory.

The honest, hardworking, conscientious exhibitor is often "exploited" most innocently for he buys something at list price which is a greater price than his "shoe-string" competitor pays and he does not receive the service guarantee which should accompany the goods. One machine dealer told me that to meet competition he would have to sell a new machine at a profit represented by his cash discount, and at that would have had to accept time payment. This sale would have meant financing a "shoe-string" competitor to some high class exhibitor. This in itself would have been bad business but worse yet is the fact that it creates the suspicion that all dealers are dishonest because of the price difference which is shown and the absolutely unfair credit allowance.



All these things have shaken the faith of the exhibitor. He does not know where to buy or what to buy for he feels that whatever he does will prove to be wrong. Yet there are honest salesmen and organizations in the industry who will give square deals to those who are buying goods. The prospective purchaser should write direct to the headquarters of the reputable manufacturer or exchange or deal with those having actual authority to close a deal. We stand ready at all times to help in this, for it is our aim to do all in our power to help our subscribers and any others who purchase goods on which we have or can obtain information. We go further, doing all in our power to see to it that our advertisers are honest in every way, both in their advertising claims and in their goods. We want to be informed if this is not the case as we do not wish in any way to be a party, even inadvertently, to this "exploiting" of exhibitors. We even go so far as to ask that you request our cooperation and help.

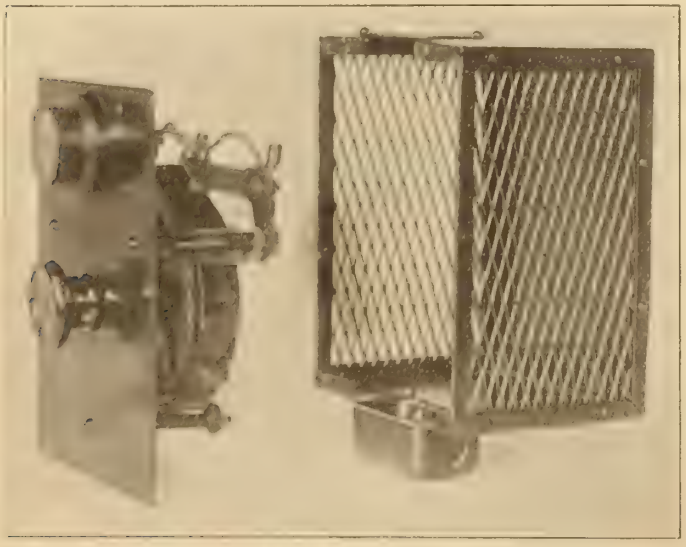
Equipment Operating Projection Questions Answered



General Electric Introduces New Compensarc

TO take advantage of the fact that the direct current arc is much more efficient for projection than the alternating current arc, the General Electric Company has developed a new type of A. C. to D. C. Compensarc (motor generator). This A. C. to D. C. Compensarc as suggested by the name is designed to operate on an alternating current supply and furnish direct current to the projection arc lamp. It does this at an exceptionally high efficiency as it requires no steadying resistance in the circuit and gives an unusually quiet and steady arc, assuring a bright picture.

G. E. Series Type Compensarc

This new design, known as the Series Type, because the two projection lamps are connected in series to the Compensarc while changing over the projection from one machine to the other, is the acme of simplicity as regards operation and therefore can be handled easily by the operator. It is built in three standard sizes, 35, 50 and 70 amperes for use on any standard A. C. circuit.

Complete equipment includes the Compensarc, a steel cabinet type control panel and two short-circuiting switches (one for each projection lamp). The 50 and 70 ampere outfits have in addition a starting compensator. The control panel has an ammeter and generator field rheostat, which is enclosed within the cabinet, while the control handle comes through to the front of the panel just below the ammeter where it is most handy for the operator to reach in controlling the current delivered to the projection lamp. The control for close regulation of the current at the arc is obtained by this generator field rheostat.

The ammeter, field rheostat and all wiring are mounted on the front wall of the cabinet. This front is removable to facilitate wall mounting of the cabinet. The wiring may be brought in at either the top or the bottom through the knock outs provided.

Fred J. Alles, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., our good friend and a staunch supporter of the N. A. M. L., writes:

"Just a few lines to let you know that I am still on the map and still chief operator at the Orpheum theatre.

"You said you wanted the operators to send in photos of their outfits so here you are, and now let's see this photo in the next issue of the News. This photo shows a Powers 6 A running, and is what I call a good picture. It was a time exposure, the camera used being a No. 3 Brownie.

"Let's see photos of some of the other fellows' outfits in the Projection columns of the Motion Picture News."

Comment: We are pleased to reproduce the photo of one of Mr. Alles' machines in operation, as the same will prove quite interesting to most readers. It is quite a difficult matter to photograph the passage of the light rays from so brilliant a source as the electric arc without encountering excessive halation, such as may be noted surrounding the aperture plate of the projector in Mr. Alles' photo. It will, however, be readily apparent that the passage of the light from condensers to aperture is well shown by reason of the fact that the room beyond the light beam was suitably darkened.

When one attempts to photograph the passage of the light rays through the projector optical system he must be content to record the light rays only, if a thoroughly instructive picture is desired. By this we mean that if sufficient exposure is given to reproduce the details of the mechanism, the representation of the light rays is severely over-exposed. Halation may be greatly reduced in this class of photography by the use of double-coated plates, while the so-called "non-reversible" or hydrazine plates are also able to cope with such extremes in exposure.

We will be glad to publish photos of our operator readers' machine outfits at any time, as it is by studying these photos that the operators gain ideas concerning operating-room design and the location and installation of equipment.

Omaha Still the Seat of Film Mutilation by Exchanges

Mr. J. R., Sioux City, Iowa, a member of the N. A. M. L., writes: "I am enclosing punch hole trade brands cut out of two Universal stories. The eleven large-lettered clippings were cut out from Parts One and Two—First Episode—of the serial 'The Mystery Ship.' The seven clippings showing dotted numbers were cut out of a two-reel L KO comedy, 'Deep Seas and Desperate Deeds.'

"We are getting this service from the Omaha exchange and we have several times called the attention of the exchange manager to the fact that exhibitors do not feature punch marks to their patrons, and that some employe at the exchange is butchering some of the best scenes in their most valuable features, but friend manager doesn't seem to pay any attention to any communications which contain 'kicks,' or complaints, even when samples are enclosed. So I determined to request your co-operation in seeing to it that this exchange wakes up to the fact that there are a few operators who are interested in real projection and want at least some backing on the part of the management of the film exchange furnishing the service they run. We all try hard to keep the punch mark evil in some state of control, and here an exchange sends out a punch hole brand which makes the 'hick' operators' private punch marks look small in comparison. Is it any wonder real friends of good pictures get discouraged?"

Comment: It is not so long ago, as readers of the Projection Department will recall, that we published a complaint regarding the manner in which a prominent Omaha exchange defaced new and valuable films by excessive and ridiculously foolish use of a stencil device, and the letter reproduced above would seem to indicate that this is a regular practice in that city.

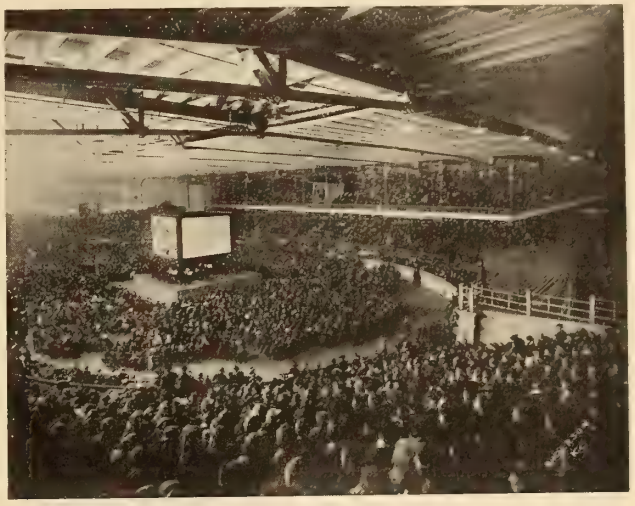
It appears that the exchange managers, or mismanagers, in that vicinity are of the opinion that if a reel of film is mutilated in six or eight places by cutting large and unsightly letters and numbers through the film it will be easy to recover the same in case of theft. This practice of stencilling a series of identification numbers at numerous places throughout a reel of film is small protection against theft, to say the least, for as we have previously pointed out, these marks could be as easily removed by a film thief as by progressive operators, such as the members of the National Anti-Misframe League.

Coming now to the facts of the present case, the Omaha Universal exchange apparently possesses two kinds of stencil cutting devices. One produces the customary numerals formed of circular performations, but the other one cuts large solid numbers and letters from the film, and the large number of clippings forwarded by our correspondent shows series of as many as eight of these large and unsightly letters stencilled in succession at various places throughout the reel. Some of these identification numbers appear right in the middle of prominent scenes in the film, while others have been cut through titles, and the effect of these large stencilled letters when projected on the screen can well be imagined.

When we add to the stencilling annoyance the fact that these Omaha exchange mismanagers, have not the necessary fortitude or courtesy to reply to the letters of complaint from their customers, it is apparent that the presence of numerous N. A. M. L. members in the Omaha territory is a fortunate circumstance, because the League members are conscientiously repairing, to the best of their ability, the unwarranted injury which films receive from the exchanges that own them.

We have written to the manager of the exchange above referred to, setting forth conditions in a manner similar to our remarks here, and we have extended Mr. Manager the use of these columns for the presentation of his reply.

Victor Animatograph Issues Attractive Catalog



WE have just received from the Victor Animatograph Co., Davenport, Iowa, a copy of their latest catalog descriptive of the Model 2 Victor Animatograph, which, as is generally known, is a most excellent and serviceable, portable, projecting machine.

The introduction to the catalog states that the reader's time will not be taken up with a boastful, florid description, but the well prepared illustrations and pointed text serve to thoroughly outline the various features of the Animatograph projector.

Quadruple Projection with Powers Cameragraph

AT a Christmas party given by the Kansas City Star, the Paramount fairy-tale "Seven Swans," featuring Marguerite Clark, was presented in quadruplicate on a four-sided screen.

There were three performances on Saturday and Sunday, December 29 and 30 respectively; and despite the absence of the star, Miss Clark, the immense Convention Hall was packed to capacity at each performance.

Quadruple Projection at Convention Hall, Kansas City

Eight Powers 6B Cameragraphs were utilized in projecting the feature on the four-sided screen, and the installation, shown in the accompanying cut, was supervised by Mr. Wm. W. Lewis of the Nicholas Power Company.

This novel feature was presented without a hitch and the synchronizing was so perfect as to be practically simultaneous.

N. A. M. F. L. Member Displays a League Slide

Glen Woodbury, Pomeroy, Iowa, writes: "I am here again shooting pictures at the same old sheet after a month's trip through the 'wild and wooly.'

"On the whole I found operating conditions fair in the West. Powers machines are largely used, in conjunction with rectifiers.

"I have just read the article about putting vaseline in the [Powers] intermittent casing. I don't believe that will work in cold weather, as the operator that was working here while I was away did that and his machine bound up on him. Luckily I just arrived that night and got the machine running. I had to remove the cover [of the intermittent casing] and clean it out with kerosene.

"I always use the Powers oil in the intermittent and it has always proven satisfactory.

"The National Anti-Misframe League Slide which I recently had made cost me only $1.25, and I think all members should get one.

"Hoping the coming year will bring even greater success to the League, I am yours for better films."

Comment: In view of the extreme cold at present prevailing in the vicinity of New York City we can see eye to eye with the correspondent's contention that a Powers intermittent casing packed with vaseline would be likely, in cold weather, to freeze up and bind the machine.

It is, nevertheless, a fact that many competent operators and expert repair men use vaseline or other heavy lubricants, such as Albany grease, for packing the Powers intermittent. It would be a severe inconvenience to have this packing freeze up over night, thus putting the machines temporarily out of operation, but leaving the vagaries of extremely cold weather out of consideration, the use of heavy lubricant on the Powers intermittent is conducive to noiseless operation and steady pictures, according to our observations. There is, on the other hand, no question but what the lubricant recommended by the Powers Company is an excellent and suitable article for use with their projector.

The correspondent has enclosed a rough pencil sketch of his

League slide, which bears the League emblem, the member's number, and reads as follows:

THIS MACHINE IS OPERATED BY A MEMBER OF THE N. A. M. F. L.

"BOOSTERS FOR
PROJECTION."

While we are not able to reproduce the exact design of the correspondent's League slide, the displaying of such a slide would be a matter of pride with all League members, and some members might like to possess a neat and attractive slide. We shall therefore endeavor to present in an early issue a printed design for displaying a slide to be used by members of the N. A. M. F. L. This can be copied by any photographically inclined member with his camera, or may be submitted to a professional slide maker for use as a pattern.

Murray Hill Trade School Has Class in Operating

Mr. Frederick Zametkin, New York City, writes:

"New York City is justly famous for many things, among them its initiative, to wit: its part in the great patriotic drive, nor is it slow in regard to matters more permanent than war issues.

"The City, through its Board of Education, aims to make of motion picture operating a profession, not merely a trade. Realizing that the public and the school children are safer and receive the benefits of a more careful education at the hands and brain of a properly trained motion picture operator, it has opened for the trade a motion picture operating class at the Murray Hill Evening High School, 237 East 37th street, New York City. To achieve these high aims the class has been opened for those in the theatrical or exhibiting profession only.

"I believe that this school, which demands no fee for its efforts, should prove a valuable asset in the development of the safe, sane and artistic in the profession."

Comment: In the past the motion picture business has been responsible for one of the severest impositions upon a gullible public, in the form of the so-called schools of motion picture operating, where, for a fee depending upon the susceptibilities of each individual pupil, an attempt has been made to enable students to pass the New York City examination for a projection machine operator's license. Inasmuch as the class in operating at the Murray Hill High School charges no fee for the instruction given it does not belong in the usual category of operators' schools.

Concerning the sort of instruction given at the Murray Hill School, it would seem, however, that the conventional curriculum of previous operators' schools is still being followed. The prospectus outlines the course as "motion picture operating and electricity incidental thereto; preparing for license examination."

We like the correspondents' declaration that the school "aims to make of motion picture operating a profession and not a trade," and we may therefore be permitted to comment briefly upon the proposition of school instruction versus practical apprenticeship as applied to the profession of motion picture operating. In all schools and classes so far promoted for this purpose, everything has been made subservient to the electrical instruction, and it has ever been the aim of the schools and the instructors to gauge the requirements of the license examiners, and to impart information which would enable the pupils to pass this examination, no matter how deficient they might be in the practical manipulation and maintenance of a projecting machine.

This is a fundamentally mistaken basis upon which to conduct a course of instruction in practical operating, and is the principal reason for our consistent opposition to the operator schools.

The fact that the municipal authorities exalt the importance of the electrical end of motion picture operating is no sound reason why electrical considerations should be considered fundamental in a course of instruction, while such basically important considerations as the mechanics and optics of projection are only treated perfunctorily. It is, indeed, a capital mistake to make the practical manipulation of motion picture apparatus subservient to the electrical requirements of the license examiners, and the most evident shortcoming of all operator schools is the lack of apparatus and facilities for a rigorous training in the practical manipulation of projection apparatus.

There is no doubt whatever that motion picture operating enjoys the status of a profession, in the case of some thoroughly experienced, conscientious students, but the process of training skilled operators partakes also of the nature of a trade, i. e., the correct handling of a projector and its complementary appliances is in no way as well learned as in the operating-room of a theatre under the supervision of an efficient and thoroughly experienced operator. Such apprenticeship, if one may use the term, is a vital factor in the education of an operator. It has also to be pointed out that the whole process of motion picture projection is based upon the science of optics, so that a knowledge of optical principles is a necessary part of a "professional" operator's mental equipment. The optics of projection have been strangely neglected by the operators' schools, but the importance of this branch of the subject becomes evident when we premise that improved optical systems in motion picture projectors will eventually permit of satisfactory screen brilliancies at one half to one third of the present day electrical current requirements. This will clearly be a triumph of optics over electricity as regards motion picture projection and this prophecy is deserving of consideration.

On the mechanical side improvements are also in store, but some of the most desirable innovations in projector design are denied introduction into eevry day use by reason of the deficiency of the average operator along the line of practical knowledge of the capabilities of his mechanism. In confirmation of this statement we have only to point out the statements of prominent makers of projecting machines that they could put fast intermittent movements upon the market, but they refrain from doing so because it would mean untold damage to films in the hands of the average operator. We consider the machine manufacturers' point well taken, because observation confirms their opinion that many operators are totally lacking in the knowledge of how to properly adjust their mechanisms.

It has been our aim in the foregoing to outline the deficiencies of previous operator schools, and to emphasize the importance of practical handling of projecting machines as a necessary adjunct to instruction in this subject. If operating is to be recognized as a profession the optics and mechanics of the subject must also be comprehended, and we trust that these phases of the subject are destined to receive recognition by our correspondent in conducting his classes.

Chapters on Photographic Optics—II

WE have seen in the previous installment how the contour of a light wave (or wave-front) passing through a positive lens is so altered that it can converge to a focus—thus forming a real image—but our consideration of the subject is in no wise complete until we have investigated the ultimate reception of the wave-fronts at the focal-plane, because the wave-theory of light sets a limit upon the perfection of performance of any optical instrument which operates with light waves.

It is well known to all serious students of optics that a luminous point of any object being photographed or observed through an optical instrument can never be reproduced as a geometrically exact point in the image, by reason of the fact that the light waves incident upon the lens are diffracted by the edges of the aperture or lens mount. We are further told that this diffraction of the incident wave-fronts causes point objects to be reproduced in the image as circular patches of light surrounded by alternating bright and dark rings, but beyond this the available text-books on photographic optics do not take us.

It is quite true that the performance of a well corrected photographic objective is of such a degree of fineness (as regards the imaging of bright points lying on the axis) that the eye can detect no sensible deviation from point imagery, but since we have been told that points of the object are never reproduced as mathematically perfect points in the image, it will be interesting for us to ascertain what is the real departure from point imagery as defined from the standpoint of Physical Optics.

In order to pursue our investigation we require to be first fortified with some elementary knowledge of simple, or harmonic, wave motion, and it will be well for us to familiarize ourselves with some of the necessary terms utilized in explaining all forms of wave motion. We begin by considering Fig. 1, which represents the simplest form of wave motion. The heavy curve in Fig. 1 shows all of the successive steps (commencing at 0 and ending at 1) which any portion of an advancing wave occupies in the course of one complete oscillation, so Fig. 1 may be said to represent one complete "wave-length."

The curve of simple harmonic wave motion shown by Fig. 1 is also known as a "sine curve," and it is interesting to note that such a curve can be readily laid out from a circle whose center is on the zero axis of the diagram (Fig. 1) in the following manner: The circle (not shown in the diagram) is divided into any number of sections of equal angular extent (8 sections in this case). The zero axis or horizontal line in the figure is divided into a like number of equal spaces. When, now, the sines of the angles into which the circle has been divided are projected over so as to coincide with their corresponding divisions on the zero axis, and these points joined in the form of a curve, the curve is the sine curve of simple harmonic motion shown by Fig. 1.

Returning, therefore, to Fig. 1 we note that the greatest distance from the zero axis (or position of rest) which the wave assumes at any time during its period of oscillation is indicated by the letters MA, and this distance is termed the maximum height or "amplitude" of the wave. The rate of oscillation of a wave, or waves, is known as the "phase" and any two points on a train of waves are said to be "in phase" if they are separated by a distance of one or more complete wave lengths, while any two points which are separated by one-half a wave length are said to be in opposite phase, and it can be easily seen that in the latter case the two points considered are moving in opposite directions.

When we recollect that the kind of waves in which we are interested are light waves, we have to translate the different positions assumed by an advancing wave into their equivalent light intensities. It is first of all apparent that the light intensities will be represened by the amplitude of the wave at any point and the light intensity at any period of an oscillation varies as the square of the amplitude. We have further to consider that in the case of an object being reproduced by a lens, trains of waves are travelling to the lens from all parts of the object, and if these trains of waves are transmitted through the lens so that they proceed to the focal-plane "in phase," the resultant intensity will be the sum of the intensities of the several separate waves, while if there is a difference of ½ a wave-length in the phase of the advancing waves they will interfere, or cancel one another, with the result that the illumination at their point of incidence on the focal-plane will be zero. It is easy to visualize the effect of interfering light waves by imagining another wave retarded ½ a wave length to be following the wave shown in Fig. 1. It will also be apparent that in the case of differences in phase of less than ½ a wave-length, in the case of trains of waves advancing from the lens, some light will reach the focal-plane, but not an amount equal to the effect of trains of waves which are in phase.

With these elementary principles of wave motion in mind we can now turn to the detailed consideration of the form in which a luminous point of the object will be reproduced as its image at the focal-plane of a lens. We will assume the lens to be so well corrected that the paths of the light rays from a point of the object to its representation at the focal-plane are equal for all zones of the lens, i. e., the lens is spherically corrected for its full aperture. We would therefore expect from the viewpoint of geometrical optics that all wave-fronts traversing the lens would arrive at the focal-plane in the same phase and that the resultant illumination at any point in the image would be the sum of the intensities of all the wave-fronts emerging from the lens.

The phenomena termed diffraction prevents this result from being realized, however, and we have next to examine the effects of diffraction, reference being had to Fig. 2*a*. In Fig. 2*a*, XY is a concave wave-front diverging to a geometrical focus at the point P. This is a refracted or dioptric converging beam and we said (Chapter I, last week) that in the cast of refracted light the rays are normal to the wave-fronts. The normal to the converging wave front XY (Fig. 2*a*) is indicated by a dotted line extending to the focal point P. We also said that in the case of diffracted light the rays were not normal to the original wave fronts and we must now find out what causes this effect.

We know that any point on a wave-front can serve as a center of disturbance from which new trains of waves can be generated, and we have first to assume that the converging wave-front XY is divided into zones, all of which are travelling in phase to the focus at P. However, the outermost zone of the wave front is partially intercepted by the lens mount (at the edges of the lens) and we have a right to assume that this mutilation of the outer zone of the wave-front can result in changing the phase (or rate of travel) of that portion of the wave-front. For our present purpose we can assume that the outer zone of the wave front is now traveling in advance of the inner zones of the same wave-front, and this is diagrammatically represented by the curve XY′ (Fig. 2a.). It has here to be pointed out that this acceleration of the edge of the wave-front takes place all around the aperture of the lens, although it can only be shown for one point in the diagram. The light from this outer advanced zone of the wave-front will naturally travel in a new direction defined by a normal to the curve XY′, and will reach the focal plane at a point Q adjacent to the geometrical focus P. If we should drop a perpendicular from the point Q to the curve XY′ we would immediately see that it was not a normal to the refracted wave-front XY, so it is apparent that the action of the edge of the lens mount on the wave-front XY has been to set up diffraction and send some diffracted light to the point Q, adjacent to, but not coincident with, the geometrical focal point.

As we have differentiated between refracted light and diffracted light we have now to examine into the exact intensity distribution of the light in the diffraction pattern which serves as the reproduction of a luminous point at the focal-plane. This diffraction pattern or disc is known under various names, but we shall follow the ingenious English authority on Physical Optics, Mr. J. W. Gordon, and term the diffraction pattern an "antipoint."

Considering now the light at P (Fig. 2a) with reference to the concave wave-front XY upon its emergence from the lens, it becomes apparent that an ether particle at P receives the maximum amount of amplitude that this wave-front can give rise to, for no greater joint effect can be produced than when the undulations all arrive simultaneously (or in phase). Let us next consider the light intensity at the point Q (Fig. 2a), which is the point of incidence of the diffracted ray with the focal-plane. Assuming the distance YY′ to be half a wave-length it is apparent that an undulation from Y must reach the point Q half a wave-length later than one arriving there from X. We know that a difference in phase of exactly one-half wave-length means that the crest of one wave will meet the trough of the other, and the amplitude of both being the same the effect due to one wave is exactly neutralized by that due to the other. Therefore, insofar as the points X and Y are concerned the point Q would receive no light, but upon joining the points between X and Y with points on the curve XY′, in the direction of Q, it is seen that the distance of separation varies gradually from nil to half a wave-length, and consequently these points on the wave-front XY produce a corresponding effect at Q varying from nil, to the maximum amplitude. Their joint effect is, therefore, the production of a certain amount of light at Q—the amplitude there being slightly less than 2/3 that at P—and the intensity of the light varying as the square of the amplitude is about 4/10 of that at P.

Coming now to the point R, still further removed from the point P, we note from the diagram, Fig. 2b, that the point Y (on the wave-front XY) is 2 half-wave lengths distant from Y″, and that the undulations therefore reach R from Y exactly one whole wave-length later than from Y″. Fig. 2b further shows, upon dividing the wave-front into two parts at C, that each point between X and C has a corresponding point exactly ½ wave-length behind it between C and Y. As each of these points neutralizes the other there is consequently no light received at R at all.

We have, therefore, at P (Fig. 3a) a point of maximum illumination, and at R a point devoid of light, while at Q, midway between P and R the light is approximately 2/3 of that at P. It naturally follows that between the points PQR there is a gradual transition, and the curve Fig. 3b represents the intensity distribution in the diffraction disc or "antipoint" formed at the focal-plane of a lens as the reproduction of a bright point. The intensity curve, Fig. 3b, is lettered at various points in correspondence with the positions indicated in Fig. 3a. Fig. 3c (greatly enlarged) gives a rough idea of the appearance or relative brightness at various parts of the antipoint.

Returning to Fig. 2c we next consider the point S, still further removed from the geometrical focus P than the point R previously considered. As is evident from Fig. 2c, the undulations from Y reach the point S three half wave-lengths behind those from X. By dividing the wave-front XY into three parts—XD, DE and EY—we see that XD and DE interfere, or neutralize each other, as regards their effect at S, in exactly the same manner as did XC and CY (Fig. 2b) with respect to the point R, but the remaining part EY (Fig. 2c) produces some light at S. We saw that when the variation from 0 to ½-wave-length was spread over the whole wave-front under consideration (Fig. 2a) the amplitude of the light at Q was 2/3 that at P, but now (Fig. 2c) that this variation up to ½ wave-length is distributed over EY, or only about ⅓ of XY, the amplitude at S cannot exceed 1/3 x 2/3=2/9. By squaring this to obtain the relative intensity of the light at S we get 4/81 or something less than 1/20 of the intensity at P.

Referring again to Fig. 3a, we now consider the point T, further removed from the focus P than any point previously considered. Now it is evident from a study of Fig. 3a that light from Y would reach the point T four half-wave-lengths later than light from X. If, therefore, we divided the wave-front XY into 4 parts, each consecutive part would cancel its predecessor, thus preventing any light from reaching T.

From the foregoing, it is evident that the central bright disc of the antipoint (Fig. 3c) is surrounded by two dark rings R and T, and that the illumination between the dark rings R and T gradually mounts up from zero (at the rings) to just a little less than 1/20 of the intensity of P at the point S, midway between the rings. It could be shown that there are further consecutive bright and dark rings surrounding the central disc of the antipoint, but they are so faint as to be negligible in all practical considerations.

Musical Review of Latest Compositions

1—"The Road to France," by S. Lund. A Martial Composition with the right spirit—which has conquered the first prize of "The National Arts Club" in its War Song Competition, October 31, 1917. The words for this famous hit have been written by Mr. Daniel M. Henderson. (Published by G. Schirmer, New York City.)

2—"Venetian Barcarolle," by Ernest S. Golden. A beautiful melody in Venetian style. Adapts itself wonderfully for theme use. The interlude is in minor, permitting the most dramatic musical interpretation. A beautiful number with harp accompaniment. (J. W. Stern, 102 W. 38th St., New York City.)

3—Norma (Waltzes), by Ernst Luz. A long concert waltz with a catchy and melodious introduction. Eight minutes of interesting melody that will be remembered. Just the kind of number needed to fill the intervals during lengthy neutral descriptive action on the Photoplay screen. (J. W. Stern, 102 W. 38th St., N. Y. C.)

4—"Stock Yard Blues," by Maceo Pinkard. Another of Pinkard's incomparable two steps—with all the melody snap and dash which made this writer famous. (Leo Feist edition.)

5—"Somewhere in France is the Lily," a novelty song by J. E. Howard. A typical composition of tempo "Marziale" most appropriate for opening purposes of scenes of a military character. (M. Witmark edition.)

6—"Bring Back My Daddy to Me," by G. W. Meyer. A valse moderato movement of exceptional tonal beauty. (Leo Feist edition.)

8—"Says I to Myself, Says I," by H. von Tilzer. A rollicking Irish Song—a sure hit if played for Parlor Comedies. (Harry von Tilzer edition.)

9—"The Cinema Music Co.," Columbia Theatre Building, New York City, announce that the following compositions are now ready for sale and are not subject to any "Music Tax":

1—"The Vampire" (A Dramatic Theme), by Sol. P. Levy.
2—"Pathetic Andante," by Paul Vely.
3—"Dramatic Recitative," by Sol. P. Levy.
4—"Dramatic Agitato," by H. Hough.
5—"Heavy Mysterioso," by Sol. P. Levy.
6—"Dramatic Tension," by Sol. P. Levy.
7—"Dramatic Narrative" for scenes of reminiscence, by Pauline Pement.

10—"Garden of Memories," by F. W. Vandersloot. A Reverie Serenade most appropriate for Love Themes. (Vandersloot Music Co.)

11—"Blue Rose Waltz" and "Moonlight Waltz," both composed by Fred K. Logan and J. V. Eppel, the writers of the famous "Missouri Waltz," are now obtainable at special reduced prices from "The Forster Music Co.," Chicago, Ill.

12—"Suite from the Ballet," by H. Arends, in six movements has been recently orchestrated by Otto Langey and published by G. Schirmer, New York City.

Popular Hits of Standard Quality

1—"Boy Scouts Parade," March by J. K. Johnson. No matter what you do buy or what you do not buy this month, do not under any circumstances neglect to secure a copy of this wonderful march. It has developed into a record smashing hit and if you do not get a copy you will miss a real hit. It is a typical Composition, snappy and melodious—and written by a man whose name is sufficient guarantee for what we have said in the above lines.

2—"Mae Marsh," Waltz by Sadie Koninsky. This number is dedicated to Miss Mae Marsh, the popular "Goldwyn Star," and is exceptional in its tonal beauty. It is a beautiful "Valse Lente" equally effective for Concert and Dancing purposes. As an accompaniment for Moving Pictures this Waltz is very appropriate for "Society Dramas" "Reception and Banquet Scenes," "Outdoor Scenes" and even as a "Love Theme" this beautiful melody would satisfy not only an audience in general but also the critic who understands something about this game—Kindly bear it in mind that the above comments on this number have not been written by "The Koninsky Music Co." but by the Music Editor of this paper, who has played this number at various occasions, with ever increasing success.

3—"The Koninsky Music Co." is also publishing the following numbers, which I earnestly recommend to any musician who thinks that good music will add to his reputation:

1—"Liberty Forever," March by B. Brown.
2—"Over the Billowy," Reverie, by K. Bayley.
3—"Shepherd's Love Song," Reverie, Serenade, by K. Bayley; a typical 4/4 Andante, movement full of melodious strains.
4—"Sunset in the Mountains," by K. Bayley; a 4/4 Andante Reverie most appropriate for Love Themes and Scenes.
5—"King of the Air," March by J. K. Johnson; by the Composer of the famous "Boy Scouts' Parade" March.
6—"Police Parade March," by B. Brown, a fine number for topical subjects.

"Faugh-A-Ballagh," the Irish Battle Cry

IN "Faugh-A-Ballagh" (pronounced Fog-a-Bolla), Fred Forster has secured an honest-to-goodness war song, and one that, if newspaper dispatches count for anything, is becoming the battle slogan during drives over in France and Italy. "Faugh-A-Ballagh" is Celtic for clear the way, and the song issued by Forster is just the sort that soldiers need, because it deals with battle and says nothing about home. It helps to offset some of the overproduction of the sob stuff.

The melody has a wonderful swing to it and is an excellent number for motion picture musicians. And the author will have an opportunity to teach it to the soldiers, as he has just enlisted.

Forster also publishes "I Wish You All the Luck in the World," a war song of a different type, which is showing up very well and being featured by singers and orchestra leaders all over the country.

With publishers like Forster, Jerome, Feist, McKinley, Vandersloot, Harry Von Tilzer, the Echo, Gilbert & Friedland, and Stern issuing good war songs, as well as numbers of other types, there is no reason why every live musician should not be able to contribute towards the success of his employer's motion picture theatre. The wise leader mixes his music, using high-class and popular brands, just as the up-to-date exhibitor does with his pictures. The out-of-town people, especially the middle class, desire to hear the best of the latest popular music, and the best of the latest run in conjunction with a good picture will fill any house. Music is a great drawing power, and anyone who has stood in a department store and watched the mob surrounding the music counter waiting to buy never doubts the pulling power of popular sheet music. Publishers win success and wealth because they worry night and day trying to find the kind of songs that will please the public, and they pay thousands of dollars for the stuff. Publishers do not attempt to give the public what they think the latter should have, but what they feel the public will like. And this should hold true with singers and musicians. Many vaudeville performers and leaders have come to realize the importance of this phase of the business, and as a result they never have to worry about their future jobs.

"Missouri Waltz," by Frederick Knight Logan, is excellent proof that many musicians do not keep on the job and on the lookout for the kind of music that will hit the public taste. Just at present it is the biggest hit on the market, having sold over a million copies at thirty cents a copy, and more leaders and musicians are writing in now than ever before, and in spite of the fact that it has been out two years. When it was first brought out only a few gave it a hearing, the few that go after everything that is put out. Every time it was played persons came to the leader or pianist and asked for the title, and in this way the big demand was created. Now no live musician would think of being without a copy of "Missouri Waltz" in his grip, but why should anyone wait until a number, published by a big or small publisher, sweeps the country before adding it to his repertoire? One leader in a big picture theatre in a western city has a large personal following simply because he has gained a reputation for keeping up to the minute with his music. When people wish to hear the latest music they go to where he is employed, regardless of the fact that they may have already seen the pictures being shown there. And any time he feels like quitting and going over to a rival house he can rest assured that he will take more than fifty per cent of his boss's business with him. But there is little likelihood of his leaving, for the exhibitor is a live wire himself and makes it his business to see that the leader is well paid for his initiative and services, and made comfortable physically. And every leader and picture musician could be just as well off, provided he kept on the job.

E. M. Wickes.

General Comments

TELL TAYLOR, the Chicago publisher, expects to open a New York office shortly, which will give leaders an opportunity to drop in and pick up orchestrations while making the rounds.

HARRY VON TILZER has just brought out a wonderful waltz song called "The Little Good for Nothing Is Good for Something After All." It is even better than "Some One's More Lonesome," which is saying a great deal.

THE Buckeye Music Co., of Columbus, Ohio, the firm that is flirting with The Saturday Evening Post, may land in New York any day and start things humming. The Buckeye has a fine catalog, and with the proper kind of representation could easily become one of the big fellows in the music game. Mr. Cox, president of the Buckeye, has a warm spot in his heart for all picture house musicians.

JOE HOLLANDER, professional manager for the Joe Morris Music Co., is positive that "There's a Service Flag in Our Home," is a big hit with the soldiers, owing to the large number of former singers now in uniform calling for it.

"LONG BOY" came from the west, made a large circle of friends in the east, and is now stirring up matters out west. "Long Boy" has plenty of "pep" to it, and is a good number for comedy and rube photoplays.

"SEND Back Dear Daddy to Me" and "When the Moon Is Shining Somewhere in France," published by Jos. W. Stern & Co., are to be featured in newspapers all over the country.

Theatres Worth While

Two Views of Arcadia Theatre, Philadelphia

Arcadia Makes Good with Higher Prices

ARCADIA theatre, Philadelphia, is proving to those who doubt the advisability of high prices that increased admissions may be charged with success. This house has a seating capacity of only 500 and the yearly rental is $25,000. With this taken into consideration and the fact that the highest class of pictures are shown necessitates a large income from the patrons. Twenty-five and fifty cents is charged. The result of the higher prices has been that the theatre is packed at every performance.

The photographs show the attractive interior of the house. The interior, which is almost severe in its simplicity follows the general old rose color scheme.

Music is one of the big features of this theatre. In addition to an orchestra the house is equipped with a new Kimball organ and echo organ, the latter being at the rear of the house. Both are concealed.

Directory of New Theatres

CALIFORNIA

J. A. Quinn of Los Angeles has signed a long lease on property owned by the Katherine P. Hooker estate, located at 816-820 South Broadway, where the Hampshire hotel now stands, and the ground will be immediately cleared for the construction of a motion picture theatre. This will be the first step in the formation of a new exhibition circuit in Southern California, under the direction of Mr. Quinn. The front of the new house will be along the lines of the architectural period of the Spanish renaissance in California. The seating capacity will be about 900, and special attention will be paid to resting and smoking rooms.

Construction work of the new Miller theatre commenced last week. Architects who provided the original specifications for the theatre were obliged to remake the plans because of the impossibility of obtaining building material of suitable quality. Modifications which will not affect the beauty or aesthetic value of the building have now been made and work will be rushed.

GEORGIA

The New Liberty theatre at Camp Gordon, Atlanta, which has a seating capacity of more than 3,000, and is one of the handsomest and best arranged playhouses erected for the entertainment of selectmen in the United States, was formally opened on New Year's day with two performances of "The Vision," the Christmas pantomime by Mrs. Earle Sherwood Jackson.

INDIANA

The foundation of the new Terre Haute theatre at Wabash avenue and Eighth street is now ready and Superintendent Davidson says construction work will be rushed to completion, in the hope that the house will be in readiness for occupancy by the first of May.

IOWA

A new motion picture theatre is being erected at Mount Vernon by the Community Drama League.

KANSAS

J. H. Cooper of Topeka has completed plans for the erection of a three-story building at 308-310 East Douglas Avenue, Wichita. The actual work of construction will be commenced about the first of March, when the leases on the old building expire.

Mr. Cooper and others associated with him have obtained a 25-year lease on the property, which is owned by L. S. Naftzger. The theatre building will have a frontage of 50 feet. Two store rooms on the first floor will open on Douglas avenue, with the theatre in the rear. The building will cost approximately $85,000.

MARYLAND

The Camp Meade Mercantile and Amusement Company, represented by E. P. Powers, 4094 Pimlico boulevard, Baltimore, have had plans prepared by Otto G. Simonsen, Maryland Casualty Building, Baltimore, for a one and two-story theatre and store building to be built at Odenton.

MICHIGAN

The Stoddard and Wallace theatre will be the name of the new vaudeville and motion picture theatre now in course of erection at Charlevoix.

MISSOURI

C. L. Higginbotham is preparing the second story in his new building at Seneca for a motion pictupre theatre.

NEBRASKA

A. H. Blank, of the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, is erecting a theatre in Omaha with a seating capacity of 2,500, and is to be known as "The Rialto."

The new Strand at Evanston is fast approaching completion and will be opened in the near future.

Gentlemen:-

When I ran the first episode of "The Fighting Trail" at the Century Theatre, my receipts were $325.00, which broke all records for serials at my house. When I showed the first episode of "Vengeance—and the Woman", my receipts were $563.00, which was $238.00 more than I took in on the first episode of "The Fighting Trail" and which was $138.00 more than my receipts on a big special production which had a long run on Broadway.

I might say that the record set by this special production, $425.00, was the biggest record of any kind ever made at my theatre up to that time. "Vengeance—and the Woman", with its first episode playing to $563.00, is the record of records.

Very truly yours,

MABEL NORMAND
in Dodging A Million

By Edgar Selwyn & A M. Kennedy

This unusual mystery-drama reveals "the new Mabel Normand" —as beautiful and lovely as ever; still the glorious comedienne and also a dramatic actress of power, of emotional range and infinite pathos. This is the first big box-office event of 1918.

Released everywhere: January 28.

THIS BEARDED MAN OF MYSTERY

DELIVERS the trunks of gowns and jewels; the letters of warning and instruction from the rich old "Aunt Bettina" and the vial of gray powder for the final deed of desperation, to beautiful Arabella Flynn, who is suddenly and magically lifted from poverty to plenty.

You can guess, of course, that Mabel Normand is "Arabella Flynn," but there's not a chance in the world of guessing or anticipating the things that happen through the interference of the bearded stranger.

This splendid production contains the vitally necessary dollar value for every exhibitor and the plot, thrills, situations, pathos, laughs, disappointments and triumphs that the great amusement public demands on the screen.

Goldwyn places its guarantee behind Mabel Normand in "Dodging A Million" because it will be an assured profit-maker throughout the world.

TRIANGLE

The Tower of Babel

DO you remember the story of the Tower of Babel?

Races of all the world came together and started work on a tower that was to reach to the sky. It was to touch the stars. It was to solve the problem of getting to Heaven by the easiest route.

But when the workers got about half of the tower completed, they found that they were building on quicksand; that their plans were not scientifically based; and that they could not even understand each other. The result was a terrific quarrel in three or four hundred different languages and the abandonment of the project as impractical.

So it is with many schemes, plans and ideas for cornering the business of the motion picture exhibitor.

The exhibitor sees a beautiful and impractical tower of profits raised before his eyes with uncertain services, excessive rentals and enormous overhead expenses. Each producer speaks in a different tongue to the exhibitor, raising a tower of Babel before his confused and weary eyes, and dinning his ears with the old, old story.

Then the tower collapses and a lot of exhibitors hit the sorry trail of experience—sadder and poorer men.

Triangle is attempting to build no Tower of Babel. We are not aiming to build the Triangle structure into the skies until it reaches the heavens. We don't want a monopoly and we are not trying to make all of our profit in a day.

We have planned the Triangle structure four square to the winds. It is built on the policy of the square deal to the exhibitor. Our first consideration is always the exhibitor. He must make his profit and we must help him. He must meet his overhead without worry or fear. He must show pictures that will bring credit to his theatre and add to his patronage. He must be successful. His success will mean our success.

Any Triangle Exchange Manager is willing to help you, to advise you, frankly and honestly. He is reserved in his representations, helpful in his attitude, instructed to avoid exaggeration or misstatement and to aid you in building up your business. His attitude is a Triangle attitude, four square to the wind.

Build on enduring Triangle principles. Write the Triangle exchange nearest you.

THE MOST STARTLING AND UNFORGETABLE

COMING TO BROADWAY SOON

THE WONDER STORY OF THE AGE

TARZAN OF THE APES

BY EDGAR RICE BURROUGHS
DIRECTED BY SCOTT SIDNEY

COMMENT

This is a romance of the African forests, more fascinating, more unforgetable than any story of many past seasons.

Tarzan is the orphaned son of a British nobleman, adopted while a baby by a tribe of anthropoid apes and cared for during his childhood and youth by a fierce animal foster-mother. He learns all the secrets of the wilds, he acquires the strength and agility of his associates, and in time his human intelligence aids him in becoming the leader of the tribe.

His fearless encounters with the jungle terrors, his slowly dawning realization that he is a man, his pathetic efforts to add to his knowledge, are experiences such as have been nowhere else described with so absorbing an interest.

When he meets with others of his kind and is able to note the strange differences; when he sees the woman who should be his mate but is separated from him by insurmountable obstacles, even greater trials are before him.

It is more than a strong, unique story—it is one that will be remembered and read again and again through the coming years.

Making the World Safe for the Exhibitor

A bit of grim humor from the great war: The boys in the front trench were being subjected to an intense drumfire. The air was thick with missiles of high and low calibre. Broadly speaking, they were pelted with everything, from birdshot to locomotive boilers, and nothing had much chance to survive.

"It could never be worse than this," said one Tommy, crouching low.

"Oh, I don't know," answered a more cheerful comrade. "They might begin snowballing us, too."

The motion picture exhibitor has felt a good deal as if a climax had arrived in his troubles and that the outlook was hopeless.

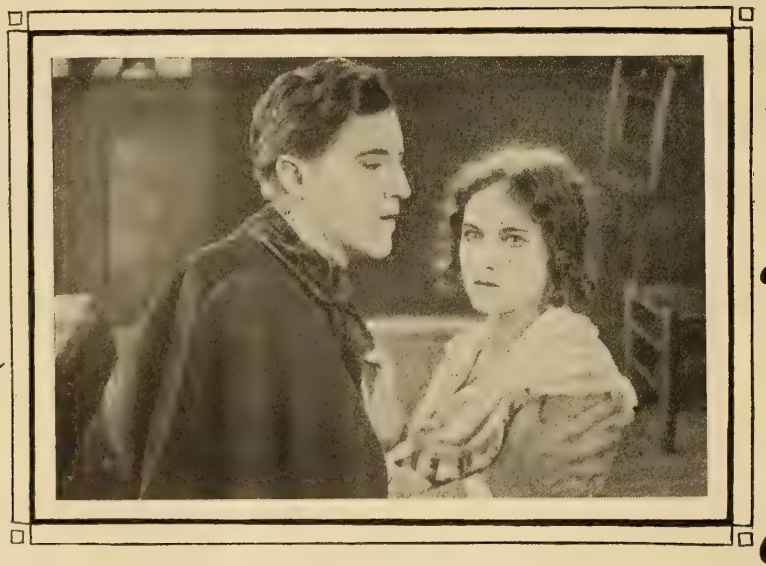
Since the time when the exhibitor used to get most of his pictures from General Film Company and made money, changes galore have occurred. With the multiplication of distributing concerns the exhibitor has been over sold and under served. Three and four years ago he used to obtain a whole week's show for say $50, and put money in the bank from the proceeds. Today the same showman spends $350 for a similar amount of film and retains hardly any profit. The extravagance in useless duplication of exchanges is chiefly to blame.

General Film Company, however, can show him the prospect of better conditions. Indeed, these conditions have been inaugurated. They open up an existence for the exhibitor comparable to the former days when he prospered exceedingly.

Of late General Film Company has had success fighting to insure more economical merchandising for the trade. By accepting the product of film manufacturers generally for marketing through its extensive system it has promoted a modern conservation idea.

General Film is rapidly becoming a great clearing house—the first—for motion pictures. With the most important and varied product assembling under one roof the distribution cost becomes progressively reduced to a minimum.

It will do wonders toward making the world safe for the exhibitor.



General Film Company does not exact the 15 cent charge on any of its releases

IN
"The Cross Bearer"

In offering you this special production on The Program, World-Pictures again demonstrates its fairness of policy and positive intent to make you more money.

"The Cross Bearer," directed by George Archainbaud, is a picture about the war, but not a "war picture"---a story of the great churchman whose name is now a household word that appeals to every one of every religion---a drama of today interwoven with the romance of a wonderful love story.

"The Cross Bearer" is a great big picture, the kind that "stands them out" at every performance.

"The Birth of Democracy"—genuine democracy in the fullest sense of the word—the right of the rule of the people, is the theme of this picture. In strong and powerful strides this picture shows that democracy is not the expression of a faction or class among the people, no matter how popular at times such expression might be. Strongly opposing the dictatorial spirit of extremists that so easily becomes oppressive in its ascendency—pleading for a thoroughly representative admission of the affairs of state, the picture no doubt shall prove a great lesson to all who are friends of democracy."

The picture is exquisitely staged, and one can easily believe that the filming of it may have taken three years."

THE SPY MENACE

FROM THE BROOKLYN EAGLE, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Like a well-knit play of mystery, plot and counterplot, the vast intrigue against this government and the lives and property of its citizens is being unfolded. There is plenty of action, and suspense is growing in intensity. Today we are told that "Lieutenant Robert Fay, charged with being active head of the Teutonic conspiracy to destroy ships . . . and munitions plants . . . has been deserted by his backers. . . . There are other elements of interest. William J. Flynn, chief of the United States Secret Service, has been given a free hand, with orders to go to the bottom of the elaborate plot. Mr. Flynn seldom falls short of expectations. He is not easily baffled.

"THE EAGLE'S EYE"

by

William J. Flynn

Recently Retired

CHIEF of the U.S. SECRET SERVICE

¶ Is the story of the Imperial German Government's spies and plots in America.

¶ It is a twenty episode serial of facts. Into its revelations of how the Kaiser's proposed reign of terror in America was prevented has been written a story of thrilling, heart-stirring romance.

¶ "The Eagle's Eye" is the supreme serial effort. It has no equal in appeal, in public interest, in the international importance and prominence of its story. It is a box office value too big to be figured from precedents.

Volume 17. No. 5 February 2, 1918

We Have Faith

THE editorial we are writing on Tuesday, January 22, differs but slightly in text from that we would have written on the morning of Thursday, January 17.

Then the industrial world east of the Mississippi stood dazed by the Fuel Administrator's drastic order. The feeling of protest ran high.

Our thought then could be uttered in the phrase "Stand by!" Our thought now is the same, tempered by succeeding events which have shown that it will not be so difficult to "Stand by."

The first rift in the clouds came with the permission to open theatres on Mondays, the second with the intimation that the one day a week ban may be lifted earlier than expected, the third with reports from many theatres that the extra Monday business will go far towards counteracting the loss on the closed day.

But in industrial centres there still remains the danger that the loss of wages for the five day shutdown period, and possibly for one day a week, will have its effect.

And our thought is still—"Stand by!"

* * * *

TO us "over here" there is given an opportunity to show that we can obey orders as we would "over there." Whether that opportunity is the gift of necessity or of incompetence is not for us to say.

We have been given orders. Time spent in bewailing those orders is time lost from the task of meeting the problems they have created.

And, with or without the burdens brought by war, never was it so necessary for picture men to devote every moment to business thought—to business-creating thought.

Never was it so necessary—and probably never will it be so vital again—to seek courage in the injunction, "Stand by! Straight ahead!"

This was our text last week, this our thought—whether spoken or not—for the weeks to come: "Straight ahead!"

* * * *

TO the bigger theatres this sign-post seems unnecessary; the reports we receive concerning them and from them are colored with the most roseate of hues.

But there is food for discouragement in the siftings from the vast eighty per cent.

The eighty per center is losing heart.

The eighty per center is weary.

The eighty per center's lips are framing the words, "Close up or sell out."

There is a vast dividing gulf between the theatre man who told us last week, "I am not kicking about high rentals; I'll pay still higher prices for pictures that will keep on bringing me the money," and the man who wrote, "Last month I gave the Government more in war taxes than I will make in months for myself."

And to the latter we don't believe we can reiterate too often the injunction to "Stand by!"

This year is the crisis, this year is the test of your fitness as an exhibitor—but it is also the test of the industry's fitness.

* * * *

THE industry will not fail. It needs the eighty per center, it will help the eighty per center, it will hold on to the eighty per center.

There is aid, it would seem to us, in World Film Corporation's remarkable offer, detailed in the news columns of this issue.

There will be further help for the eighty per cent—moves that will strike more deeply at the roots. Of that we feel certain.

There will be improvement in the general psychological attitude toward war-time entertainment. That, we have pointed out, was the experience of Engand. We see no reason for fear that it will not be our experience.

The eighty per center with a reason for existence will continue to exist. If you close up now or sell out you are giving way to someone who will reap what you have sown. If you have sown well, he will reap well. If you have sown well, cultivate well—stand by—and you will reap your own harvest.

We don't believe we are mouthing words for the sake of the words; we don't feel that we are speaking "fol-de-rol optimism."

"Fewer pictures, better pictures"; "Less production and distribution extravagance"; "Don't forget the eighty per center," are phrases that have been tossed about over the years.

But these would seem to be the days when the words are made deeds——

For film men are facing the facts, film men are digging deeply into the problems of the business, film men are thinking.

And when film men think—we have faith.

C. S. Houston

Speaking Editorially:

ONE DAY LATE!

¶ Due to the closing down of our printer MOTION PICTURE NEWS will this week be issued in New York and reach out-of-town subscribers one day later than usual. The same rule will apply for the next nine weeks, till and including the week of Monday, March 25th.

¶ For that period, therefore, MOTION PICTURE NEWS will be issued in New York on Wednesday mornings.

First Find the Patient

THE doctors who would prescribe for the industry are most generally wrong because they do not know their patient.

We have about 12,000 picture theatres worthy of consideration. We constantly speak of these theatres as a unit.

They are not a unit and cannot be so regarded. To prescribe for them, under such a supposition, may prove fatal.

Daily the breach grows wider between the big house and the little house. One wants one thing and one wants quite another.

Take the question of high rentals. We hear few complaints from the big fellows who are filling their big houses. But the little fellow writes in and says: "I simply cannot make any money."

Had we not better realize this wide line of demarcation and prescribe separately for each main class of theatres? And is it not wise to begin prescribing for the little fellow right away?

Hip! Hip! Hurrah!

WE are going to tell you next week about a state rights buyer who came to New York and left for the West waving his hat and leading cheers over the fine treatment he got from a seller of territorial rights.

Sounds strange; but it rings true. The facts were given us by the man himself, not by the company which accorded the fine treatment.

This buyer will undoubtedly extend the same square, live-and-let-live treatment to his customer — the exhibitor. And the firm that has such business policies will acquire many more solid clients; and eventually, through such practices, an important branch of the film industry will be put upon a stable and flourishing basis all around.

It's True That—

LAST week's press matter brought us an interview with a company head which declared that, "The surface has only been scratched in the film industry."

Another press agent's star has received a letter from a Japanese admirer.

Heat prostration affected two other press agents to the point of sending stories about the studio monkey and the studio daschshund.

Yes, it's all true, and—maybe—interesting.

We Are Wondering, Too

A SOUTHERN exhibitor who thanks us for our editorial consideration of the small house winds up his letter with:

"There is not a manager or owner in this entire section that depends on his theatre for his income. Do you get that?"

We do get it. And we realize keenly what you are up against because we receive many such letters.

And all we can say is: Hang on. Stick to your ship during the squall.

If you are doing everything possible and practical to make a showman's success then help for you is inevitable. Some man or some plan or both are going to come to your assistance with the pictures and the prices that will enable you to conduct your theatre profitably.

They will come to your help because it will be good business—for them and for you. Good business always forces action. That's why help is inevitable.

You are wondering probably why the industry doesn't wake up more quickly to your requirements.

Well, so are we.

Stopping Production

SINCE we are all practically agreed that there is much overproduction and that the markets' great demand is its mass of undigested film, then what is wrong with the suggestion to stop production for a while?

Many important considerations are involved—undoubtedly. Possibly there are enough such considerations to kill the idea.

But surely the main simple thought stands out: that the market, unfed for a while, will digest its digestible film.

Which in turn goes back to the simplest, truest fact about the film industry: that maximum profits are made from the maximum circulation of the film.

Passing an Idea Along

"I WISH you could hammer away on an editorial that would make producers put better help and more efficient service in their shipping rooms for postors and films," writes a Chicago exhibitor to MOTION PICTURE NEWS.

Just as a starter toward "hammering away" we are mentioning the matter here. Two specific instances he mentions have been referred to the companies affected.

Meanwhile, we are passing the thought along to you—Mr. Manufacturer and Mr. Exchange Head. Does the cap fit? Or, have you done anything particularly constructive toward meeting the problem presented?

We'd like to tell about it, if you have. Drop us a line.

Speed Up!

A DAY has been taken out of the week. A holiday has been given.

To picture theatres it is almost a fair exchange. But, still, a day lost is a day lost, so, now as never, let's all get together—You, Us & Co.——

"Speed up! Lots of pep! Lots of ginger."

"Here we go!"

Serving It with Speed and Ginger

WHEW! Say, boy! Didn't the news pop hot and heavy this past week? We haven't got our breath yet, though the printer gave us an extra holiday Monday to sort of help our equilibrium.

News—news—news. After you turn this page you'll find yourself in a tangle of it—page after page.

We didn't attempt to give you one of those "magaziney" feature articles this week. With all the news you might miss it—and the one we have ready is one that we don't want you producers to miss. It's aimed right at you men who hold the bag—and the one that hits you next week is only the first of a series.

"Tabloid dramas" they are to be—each a real drama of studio extravagance. No names are mentioned, but the facts of each incident in the farces are on file and on request will be given "to whom it may concern."

* * * *

BUT that's for next week—after you and yours truly catch up with the news of this week.

It all broke so unexpectedly, too. After several news-less weeks, or merely simmering ones at best, we lifted the phone receiver Tuesday morning to hear:

"Do you know the Exposition at Grand Central is off?"

We didn't—so we investigated.

As we go to press we are told that "no final decision has been reached." But it seems tolerably certain that any New York Exposition this year will be in September.

Which is news, we are certain. Whether it is important forty-five minutes from Broadway we are not quite so certain. [Page 687]

* * * *

THEN Thursday and the fuel order. At first a terrible blow and much wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then Saturday and a modification of the order. A few smiles. Then Tuesday morning and news that five of the "Garfield days" might be called off. More smiles. Then reports from a score of theatres that they had done record business on Monday because of the holiday crowds. Smiles all around.

Of course you have read the fuel story backwards and forwards in your dailies by this time. But even so, we think we have a few new twists for you in our reports. [Page 680]

THURSDAY brought the shower of holidays. "What Will Friday bring?" we thought.

For newspapermen will tell you that it never fails. When news starts to bang it keeps right on banging, it just don't know when to stop.

But Friday wore along its length and not a bit of "new news" stirring. Then a flimsy half-page of typewritten copy drifted to our desk. We started to read without much hope. We covered four lines and then gasped.

"What's this—a film company offering free film?"

Yes, it's true. World Film has done the trick. It's a "war measure" and one that looks real to us.

And no matter how it looks to us—it certainly will start something.

CAN you imagine a meeting of producers discussing the proposition of closing down production for a period of thirty or sixty days?

Sounds interesting—doesn't it?

If the proposal had only met with more general approval it would have been even more important than interesting. But interesting it remains, so you'll want to read our thoroughly readable exclusive story. [page 685]

"WHAT Kind of a Fellow is—Freuler?" Do you know?

Few do. John R. Freuler doesn't seek the limelight very often, and when he does it isn't with interviews on such pregnant subjects as whether Harold Hollywood should part his hair in the middle or wear it pompadour.

No such fascinatingly human subjects for John R.

He usually talks business, sound, logical, common-sense business, too—making it worse.

It seems that John R. Freuler is that kind of a fellow—but then you'll know him better after you read William A. Johnston's mayhap-interview. [Page 691]

SPEAKING of business and a business man reminds us of another set of business men. The First National Exhibitors met in New York last week for a directors' meeting.

And though the town overflowed with big exhibitors for a few days, those First National men just seem to meet to do business—drat 'em—never to make news or near-news.

But in that connection it might be mentioned that the first Chaplin-First National subject is now well on its way. That's news. [Page 708]

SCATTERED here, there and all over this week's book there are bits of news that would ordinarily crowd into this page in big shape, but in this week of weeks they have to get a passing mention.

Metro, which last week came to bat with rather startling ad-copy, this week follows with eight brilliant insert pages and a news story of forthcoming productions that ate up a whole page of our book for the telling.

Wonder if it's the influence of that first lieutenant's khaki that Arthur James is wearing these days?

Then there is the news that Universal, which last week showed signs of renewed activity at the Coast studios, reversed itself just after we got through pointing to it as a sign of optimism, and, finding enough productions on the shelves for many months to come, laid off practically all companies till after the rainy season.

Much as Garfield did after he read our last week's fuel story. [Pages 685 and 719]

NEWS also can be found in the fact that General Film is about to move into spacious uptown offices. If any proof were needed that big things are doing in G. F. then the fact that the staid old organization is tearing away from the downtown Fourth Avenue address is sufficient for us.

An item also will be found about Pathe's arrangement to use the Peralta studios.

And—oh, well, you better start over the book yourself. There's hardly a line you'll want to miss.

Theatres, Dazed, Rally Quickly

Monday Openings, with Special Matinees, Expected to Counterbalance Effect of Closed Tuesdays—Local Conditions to Decide Film Rental Attitude

DAZED by the announcement of the Fuel Administration decreeing a five-day close down of industry in the territory east of the Mississippi and ten fuelless Mondays affecting picture theatres, film men rallied quickly after the modification permitting Monday performances with Tuesday the holiday.

Reports received by Motion Picture News from all sections are especially optimistic. For one thing, the national order has saved picture theatres from more irksome rulings by local administrators, especially in Detroit and Boston. Also, results of the first Monday performances showed that the extra matinees and the general holiday spirit resulted in business that will go far towards counterbalancing the dark Tuesdays.

No Contract Ruling

Efforts to secure a general ruling on the attitude of film companies towards exhibitor contracts during the ten "extra-holiday weeks" were unsuccessful, the companies seeming to have left the decision to local conditions and individual cases.

The closing order of the Fuel Administrator affects theatres on the ten Tuesdays starting January 22nd and including March 26th. The text of Dr. Garfield's order changing the text of his original ruling which named Monday as the closing day, is as follows:

"In order to accommodate public holiday attendants, fuel may be burned on any of the Mondays beginning January 21, 1918, and continuing up to and including March 25, 1918, for the purpose of supplying heat for theatres, moving picture houses, bowling houses, billiard rooms, private or public dance halls or any other place of public amusement, but no fuel shall be burned on any Tuesday beginning January 22, 1918, and continuing up to and including Tuesday, March 26, 1918 (except to such an extent as is essential to prevent injury to property from freezing) for the purpose of supplying either heat or light for any of the places of amusement aforesaid on any of the Tuesdays above specified.

"To the extent indicated herein the regulation of the United States Fuel Administrator, dated January 17, 1918, is hereby modified."

WHAT OF FEB. 12?

It's Lincoln's Birthday and It's on a Tuesday —What's the Answer?

FUEL ADMINISTRATOR GARFIELD has granted the theatres permission to open on the ten "Garfield Mondays," but ordered they close down on Tuesday instead.

But Lincoln's birthday, a "big money" holiday in most sections of the country, comes on a Tuesday this year.

Motion Picture News, before going to press, sought to secure information from the Fuel Administration as to whether theatres in northern states would be allowed to open that Tuesday and close Wednesday, but nothing could be learned.

Can the theatres afford, without looking ridiculous, to ask Washington for still another modification of the Fuel order?

Or isn't it likely that "before we come to the bridge" a voluntary concession will come from Washington?

Universal Against Protests of Industry

Within an hour after receiving the fuel conservation order, Administrator Garfield, the Universal Company issued the following notice to its employees, over the signature of President Carl Laemmle:

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company is entirely out of sympathy with the committees from the various industries which are flying toward Washington to protest against the new order of the fuel administrator.

The fact that this order has the approval of President Wilson is quite enough for us.

This company, like every other company in the country, has pledged its resources to aid the government in a successful prosecution of the war.

And now, for the first time, we are put to the test to see whether such pledges were empty phrases or if they really carried a meaning. If we have a grain of real patriotism, we will grin and bear whatever burden the government may be compelled to impose upon us during these times of ordeal.

We request employees of this company to refrain from making unfavorable comment on the action of the government. Let us look at the doughnut, not at the hole. Let us remember how little we are sacrificing in comparison with the young men of the nation who are offering their lives where we are asked to offer only our dollars. If we are stripped of every dollar we possess, if we are reduced to the extremest poverty—we will still have life.

Let us show the Kaiser and his crew that our pledge of support to our government was not made merely to be withdrawn at the first real pinch of war. Let us be ready in our minds to drop everything else, if necessary, and devote our hearts and souls to the one great object of making the world a fit place to live in.

Standing by the President means STANDING BY THE PRESIDENT. It does not mean arguing, protesting or quibbling. The President has the most terrific task that was ever imposed upon a single human being in the history of the world. Let's make his burden as light as possible and not participate in anything that will tend to confuse his mind and swerve him a hair's breadth from the great purpose he outlined in his recent message to the world.

If we are patriotic, now is the time to PROVE IT.

A copy was telegraphed to Washington and an acknowledgment of its receipt there was sent to Mr. Laemmle. The Universal edict was published in part in the newspapers and commented upon editorially by some.

Theatrical Unions Take Action on Salaries

In response to numerous inquiries received from exhibitors throughout the country asking advice on regulation of salaries for stage employes and musicians, the Motion Picture News has communicated with the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes and the American Federation of Musicians as to the action which these organizations have taken.

The question of the arrangement of salaries for the members of both these unions was taken up at a special meeting called for Tuesday of this week, at which the union representatives will confer with the New York managers.

It was announced that the action taken at this meeting would not affect organizations outside of New York as the contracts held by stage employes and musicians are different in construction, in the different localities. This matter of the arrangement of salaries will have to be taken up by each local organization, it is announced, at the New York headquarters.

The statement was made by an official of the International Alliance of State Employes that inasmuch as Dr. Garfield, National Fuel Administrator, had recommended that all employes be given every consideration in this matter by the employers the action taken by the local unions would not work a hardship on stage employes or musicians.

Violation Causes House to Close

One of the first instances on record where a motion picture theatre has been closed as a result of the fuel conservation orders from Washington is found in the case of the Variety theatre in Buffalo. Fuel Administrator Elliott C. McDougal has ordered the Buffalo General Electric Company to discontinue current to the theatre, which is charged with violating the federal lighting orders.

The theatre is located at 740 Fillmore avenue, Buffalo.

New Yorkers Confident of Meeting Situation

While the fuel order forbidding performances on Tuesdays was strictly obeyed by Director Samuel L. Rothapfel of the Rialto and Rivoli theatres, there was no other change resulting from the new ruling. Rivoli's new bill opened as usual on Monday, the house remaining dark Tuesday, and the same bill continuing the rest of the week. Rialto followed its usual policy.

Full salaries are being paid all employes at the two houses.

Managing Director Harold Edel of the Strand announces that special arrangements have been made with the 150 employes of that house to overcome the question of salaries during the ten closed Tuesdays. A special pro rata concession was proposed by Manager Edel and accepted by all the employes.

Two Days Lost in Several Cities

Through the interpretation by various local fuel administrators of the Garfield order, motion picture theatres in several cities, including Detroit, Atlanta, Indianapolis, St. Louis and Buffalo, face the loss of two days each week instead of one.

Al Thornburg, of Detroit, wired MOTION PICTURE NEWS as follows: "In accordance with the order of Michigan fuel administrator, state and Detroit theatres will run only five hours per day and will not be open Mondays and Tuesdays. Co-operation with the state and National fuel administrators was decided at exhibitor meeting in Detroit, January 17."

Concerning this interpretation of the order, J. H. Kunsky wired William A. Brady, of the N. A. M. P. I., as follows: "Wire result of Washington interview, as Michigan administrator insists we close Monday and Tuesday and operate five hours daily balance of week. Order means financial crisis unless Washington ruling can be made to supercede this in tome to permit full operating schedule."

Taking the matter up at this juncture, William A. Brady, January 18, wired Administrator Garfield, asking a ruling. Prefacing his wire with assurance of every support from the industry in abiding by the fuel order, Mr. Brady said: "From various sections of the country, notably Detroit, Atlanta, Indianapolis, St. Louis and Buffalo, reports indicate your territorial representatives interpret your order to include one or more coalless days in addition to the several Mondays prescribed. Such interpretation as the motion picture industry believes not authorized by your order solicits from you a ruling that your territorial representatives shall not undertake to make arbitrary orders with their consequent unnecessary hardships until full facts may be placed before you. This to apply particularly to the cities mentioned.

The outcome of the Detroit, Atlanta, Indianapolis, St. Lous and Buffalo local orders remains yet in doubt.

You May Open Every Day If—

¶ Since the original fuel order allowed the burning of fuel "to such extent as to prevent injury to property from freezing" and making no mention of lights, and realizing that in many sections of the country theaters could satisfactorily operate under such conditions, Motion Picture News on Thursday of last week sent the following wire to Dr. Harry A. Garfield, Fuel Administrator:

"Can picture theatres operate Mondays with unheated auditoriums, using light from service companies?

Motion Picture News."

¶ The following reply, dated January 18th, was received:

"Answering your wire, yes.

Fuel Administrator Noyes."

¶ As this message was filed prior to the change in the Fuel Administrator's order making Tuesday the theater holiday, it is understood that the permission granted above will apply to that day.

¶ The amended order, however, expressly forbids "places of amusement . . . to use fuel on such Tuesdays for light as well as heat." Whether this will apply to lights supplied by service companies will rest with the interpreattion of the local administrators in each section and depend on local conditions. Don't attempt to operate without calling your administrator's attention to the above telegrams, and securing his ruling.

Vote Your Thanks to Col. Barry Bulkley

¶ A committee of theatrical men headed by George M. Cohan, Marc Klaw and David Belasco, journeyed to Washington Friday seeking to prevail on President Wilson to permit theatres to open on Mondays and close Tuesdays instead.

¶ The committee wasn't quite sure of its reception—its members returned to New York stating that they had failed.

¶ On Saturday morning the Fuel Administrator wired from Washington granting the privilege the managers had sought in vain.

¶ What had happened?

¶ The Administrator's concession followed the reading of the brief.

Chicago Exhibitors Call Meetings

Chicago exhibitors turned out in unprecedented numbers January 17 and 18 to attend special meetings called by Joseph Hopp, president of the local branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, to consider the problems that confronted them as a result of the fuel-saving order from Washington.

After a discussion of the situation it was moved by W. B. Heaney and carried that the Allied Legislative Committee of Exhibitors, at Washington, be asked to take steps to see what would be done to relieve the situation.

At the time of the meetings the Tuesday closing instead of Monday had not been decided upon by Washington, and the exhibitors expressed little confidence that they could bring the Tuesday closing about. They agreed not to pay operators, musicians and other employes if their theatres were closed on Mondays.

Rowland Again Heads Metro

Re-elected President at Annual Meeting, Following Stockholder Session — Clark Chosen Vice-President

AT the annual meeting of directors of Metro Pictures Corporation last week, following a two days' session of the stockholders of the corporation, Richard A. Rowland was unanimously re-elected president of the organization. The meeting was held in the Metro offices in the Long Acre Building, New York.

James B. Clark, of Pittsburgh, was elected first vice-president; E. H. Hulsey, of Dallas, Texas, second vice-president; J. W. Engel, treasurer; Charles K. Stern, assistant treasurer and J. Robert Rubin, secretary and general counsel. The directorate elected includes four new names, namely, Charles K. Stern, who has been cashier and auditor for Metro since its organization; David Stoneman, of Boston; E. H. Hulsey, of Dallas, and H. J. Cohen of New York. The directors re-elected were Richard A. Rowland, James B. Clark, J. W. Engel, John Kunsky of Detroit and A. S. Behmer of Pittsburgh.

It was announced that Metro's renewed activities along larger and broader lines would be dealt with in a forthcoming statement from President Rowland. Metro has definitely announced that it proposes to go after the leadership of motion picture industry, a promise the beginning of which it considers fulfilled in the production of "The Slacker," followed by "Draft 258," "Blue Jeans" with Viola Dana, "The Legion of Death" with Edith Storey, "Revelation" with Nazimova, "Lest We Forget" with Rita Jolivet, and the All Star Series Productions "Daybreak" with Emily Stevens, "Red, White and Blue Blood" with Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne, and "The Avenging Trail" with Harold Lockwood. Metro has further plans matured, including a five-reel picture production by Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew, of which is said to be the most pretentious thing ever done by these stars.

Metro recently pronounced a policy of open booking for first, second and third run theatres, and this policy will not only be continued but will be vigorously advocated, it is said, in all parts of the United States by the Metro representatives, who are still meeting together at the home offices in this city.

General Offices Move Uptown

Will February 1 Settle Down Into Berkeley Building in Forty-fourth Street — Have Been Downtown Heretofore

BY a lease signed last week the executive offices of General Film Company will be located in the new Berkeley Building, 25 West Forty-fourth street, New York. The change is effective February 1.

Thus another film company removes its headquarters uptown from what was formerly a considerable motion picture district of New York. The quarters which the executive officers of General Film Company are vacating at 440 Fourth avenue, at Thirtieth street, were occupied by it for two years after its removal from the Fifth Avenue Building at Twenty-fourth street. Before that the company occupied a location at 80 Fifth avenue.

General Film announced that it will be found occupying the seventeenth or top floor of the Berkeley Building, the whole suite being lighted from all sides. Accommodations will be maintained here for the executive officers, board of directors, auditing department, general sales department, legal department, and accounting department. The modern plan of office arrangement will prevail, the entire personnel of the offices occupying the entire space of the suite without partitions. This permits of diffusion of light to best advantage and also of ventilation to best advantage, and promotes the co-ordination of office activities.

The building was finished and first occupied by tenants a few months ago. It runs through from Forty-fourth street to Forty-fifth street, with a main floor arcade, and is situated immediately west of Fifth avenue.

Mail intended for General Film Company's main office after January 31 should be directed to reach the new location in the Berkeley Building, 25 West Forty-fourth street. The New York exchange office of the company remains at 71 West Twenty-third street as formerly.

A. M. Kennedy Resigns from Goldwyn

Aubrey M. Kennedy has resigned as manager of productions of Goldwyn Pictures Corporation. Mr. Kennedy has been with Goldwyn almost from its inception, having first been manager of the Fort Lee studios and later advanced to manager of productions. In addition to his executive activities he has at different times taken personal charge of the editing, cutting and titling of several of the company's popular releases. He is also co-author with Edgar Selwyn of "Dodging a Million," Mabel Normand's first Goldwyn production, to be released in a few days.

Exhibitors' Association Thanks Quimby

An indication of the popularity of F. C. Quimby, Pathe's new sales manager, is seen in the fact that at the annual meeting of the Washington Theatre Managers' Association he was tendered a rising vote of thanks and a motion was carried congratulating him on his promotion and appointment.

Jacksonville Weather

THE Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce, concerning its weather conditions in connection with the production of motion pictures, this week sent Motion Picture News via telegram the following information for producers:

"Average temperature 58 for the week. Five clear days out of seven. Temperature January 14 was 66, and day was clear. The Frohman Amusement Corporation, producing "The Birth of a Race," filmed 30,000 feet without the loss of a foot. The atmosphere of Florida creates perfection in photography."

Kalem Offices House Film Commission

The offices of the Kalem Company were open and conducting business as usual during the holidays thrust upon the eastern industrial world by Fuel Administrator Garfield's drastic order, as Kalem is quartering the American Film Commission and the Government's Committee on Public Information.

"Our factory, however, will be closed on the new holidays, in compliance with the Fuel Administrator's order," announced William Wright of the Kalem Company, "but this severe tax upon our plant will not prevent us from making prompt deliveries of the laboratory work which we are doing for various producers. With the first warning of the impending regulation we speeded up work on the prints soon to be released and there have been no disappointments."

"Incidentally," added Mr. Wright, "we will pay all of our employes in full for the enforced holidays."

First National Passes on Subjects

The board of directors of the First National Exhibitors' Circuit are in New York this week to pass final judgment on several productions which have been offered and to complete arrangements for greater co-operation in their exchange service which is just getting into good working order. Fred Dahnken of San Francisco, Aaron Jones of Chicago, Robert Lieber of Indianapolis, E. H. Hulsey of Texas and Harry Schwalbe, supervisor of film exchanges of Philadelphia, are all in attendance at the meetings which are being held at the Hotel Astor. They report business in their respective territories as being well up to average for this time of the year.

Partridge Returns to New York

Having blazed the trail through the West for productions released by the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation, Joseph Partridge, division manager of the concern, has returned to New York, where he will center his activities in behalf of the new company for the next few weeks.

"Free Film!" Is World's Offer

Features Released Prior to November 1 Will Be Given to Exhibitors Free for Bookings, Equal to Number of New Subjects Now Contracted For FREE use of World Pictures released previously to November equal to those they are showing under present contract is to be granted exhibitors as a wartime measure.

Such is the text of an announcement made this week by the World Corporation. "And it means what it says," was the additional emphasis given by a World official to MOTION PICTURE NEWS when the statement was issued. "There are no strings, no loop holes, no ifs and buts; there it is in black and white.

The official text of World Film's startling emergency measure to aid exhibitors in the present crisis follows:

"Not a Lever for New Business"

"As a war measure designed to help exhibitors toward 'standing off' the difficulties of the present time the World Film Corporation announces that exhibitors may have absolutely free use of World Pictures equal to those they are showing in their theatres under present contracts with this corporation.

"This applies to all World Pictures published prior to 'The Burglar,' which was issued at the beginning of November, and there is no string whatsoever to the proposition.

"The suggestion will not be made use of as a lever for new business, but is issued solely to benefit exhibitors in a substantial way at a time when burdens are peculiarly heavy and unavoidable.

"The World executives believe their plan is a thoroughly practical and substantial source of assistance, taking effect at a time when it will be of double value to the theatre managers contemplating prospects of a most discouraging character."

Big Features on List

There are a score of well known features on the list affected by the order, judging from the release chart of World pictures. Not the least surprising point is the fact that in the list of releases prior to November is found "Rasputin," the big World-Brady special. The new million-dollar motion picture theatre built by H. J. and Sid Grauman in Los Angeles at Broadway and Third, is scheduled to open January 25 with William S. Hart in "The Silent Man" as the feature of the program.

"Preach Confidence"—Irwin

Vitagraph Sales Chiefs Told to Keep Optimistic Spirit Uppermost—Claims Organization Emerges from Successful Months

THE sales chiefs of the Vitagraph distributing organization, following a series of important conferences held at the home office last week, have taken the field again and carry with them, it is announced, instructions from Walter W. Irwin, general manager, that the entire sales force must act and preach confidence.

"I have instructed our division managers to carry into every branch of our organization the spirit of big business, which is an honest reflection of our sales records for the past six months," said Mr. Irwin.

"Vitagraph has just gone through some of the best months in its history, and our outlook for the coming season contemplates the biggest business in the history of the company.

"Much of the industry's present-day trouble is due to fear and lack of courage. That fear is unfounded and that lack of courage to push ahead should not enter the breast of any one is proven by the history of the industry in England. At the beginning of the war, the picture business in England became panicky, but within a few months they are and still are doing a bigger business than ever before. This was because wholesale entertainment for the people at home, as well as for the men at the front, is even more necessary in times of war than in normal times.

"With the financial stress in mind, through which England has gone, and of which we, by comparison, are sure to continue to be relatively free, how can any thinking man in any branch of the industry lose courage instead of gain it?

"Where local conditions are for the moment unfavorable, the industry as a whole should recognize that these conditions are only temporary, and accordingly, there should be no let-down in confidence or let-up in efforts. The moment a person loses confidence or lets his courage ebb, his efficiency and earning capacity are at once reduced to a point far below par.

"I want our entire sales organization to sell courage. I want them to sell their goods not only on merit, but by selling confidence."

Brenon Visits Chicago Censor

Seeks to Gain Permit for "Empty Pockets" Without Going to Court —Wants Board to Consider Him as Sincere Human

HERBERT BRENON, motion picture producer, made a flying trip to Chicago last week to try new methods on the censor board of the Windy City in an effort to get a permit for his picture, "Empty Pockets." Instead of waiting until Major Funkhouser and his cohorts had slashed his film and then starting court proceedings, Mr. Brenon tried a new maneuver. He walked into the lion's den in the City Hall and tried persuasion instead of force.

Mr. Brenon visited the Major Monday morning, January 14, and after an hour's consultation with the second deputy, he was introduced to the other members on the censor board, and delivered an address in the course of which, he said:

"I am here," he said, "for only one reason. I don't want to be a printed title to you any longer. I want you to think of me as a sincere man with an avowed purpose. I have not come here to upbraid you as other producers have done. But I want you to view my picture, 'Empty Pockets' with a firm conviction that I was absolutely sincere in producing it. I am not going to go to court to force you to pass this picture, but I'm going to ask you to give me an opportunity personally to make changes that you deem necessary. No longer think of me as a printed bit of celluloid, and always remember in viewing my productions, that I am not adverse to just criticism, and am sincere in my efforts to make my pictures works of art and worthy achievements."

Sheehan Recalls Days of "Soldiering"

It is the privilege rather than the duty, though the duty also, of every young unmarried man in the country to volunteer his services to the nation for the duration of the war in the opinion of Winfield R. Sheehan, general manager of the Fox Film Corporation.

Mr. Sheehan, who is especially anxious that the motion picture industry shall be well represented at the front, and who has been exerting his influence quietly in that direction, was a volunteer during the war between the United States and Spain and was a member of the first American regiment that entered the city of Havana.

Rothacker Paying Full Salaries

Watterson R. Rothacker, of the Rothacker Film Manufacturing Company, Chicago, was in New York last week when the Fuel Administrator's order burst upon the industrial world. He succeeded in making arrangements with the employees of his plant by wire through which they are to receive full salary for the entire period of suspension ordered by the Fuel Administrator.

Mr. Rothacker was also the recipient of congratulations from New York film men on the fact that he has been able to secure unusually good shipments from Chicago during the railroad tie-up, and has also been foresighted enough to be running full blast during the coal famine.

Spoor Offers Invention to Government

Representative Juul of the Seventh District, Chicago, has transmitted to the war department from George K. Spoor an offer of a new war invention, conceived by P. J. Briggen. This invention is called a "mechanical ferret," according to its maker, capable of digging a tunnel at the rate of fifty feet an hour.

Mr. Spoor makes this offer to the war department free, with no claims for royalty, Mr. Juul declared. It was reported that the Germans were thwarted in their attempt to acquire this invention back in 1915, at which time they offered $1,000,000 for the plans.

Briggen is a Chicagoan, associated with Mr. Spoor's Essanay studio, and is known as the man who perfected the adaptation of stereoscopic photography to motion pictures.

Detroit Joins State in Association

At a meeting of exhibitors of Michigan in Detroit, January 17, to discuss the fuel orders from Washington, the Michigan and Detroit exhibitor associations, which have been operating under separate charters, were merged into the American Exhibitors' Association of Michigan. M. M. McGee, of the Majestic theatre, Detroit, was elected president, and King Perry was chosen secretary and business agent.

Shut Down Talk by Producers

But Idea Advocated by P. A. Powers as Emergency Measure Doesn't Gain Support at Hotel Claridge Gathering of Leading Producers

TALK of shutting down all motion picture production for a period of thirty or sixty days enlivened a meeting of the leading producers held on Monday evening at the Hotel Claridge. But the radical scheme, advocated by P. A. Powers, failed to win the support of the twenty other prominent picture figures gathered at the meeting.

The roster of those present included, Adolph Zukor, Samuel Goldfish, William A. Brady, William Fox, Winfield Sheehan, Arthur Friend.

Since the meeting the issuance of the Fuel Administration's closing order has renewed interest in the "shut down" suggestion. MOTION PICTURE NEWS therefore presents the story of the Claridge meeting as told by a prominent film man present:

Meeting's Purpose in Doubt

"The meeting opened informally with a discussion introduced by P. A. Powers, bearing on the present co-operation between the Government and the film industry in the making and distribution of film for Government purposes. William Fox then asked for the purpose of the meeting, stating that undoubtedly it has been called for some specific and important purpose. No one seemed to know just why the meeting was called. Samuel Goldfish then arose and referred to a subject brought up by Mr. P. A. Powers at the last meeting of the Producers' Branch of the National Association. Mr. Powers at that time recommended that production be stopped throughout the industry for a period of thirty to sixty days, and that this cessation of production be made by Government order. Considerable discussion followed Mr. Goldfish's opening of the subject. At the conclusion of the discussion a motion to carry on the matter at a further meeting was lost by an almost unanimous vote.

"The matter then came up of the holding of the National Exposition, which had been scheduled for February 2 to 8. It was voted that it was the sense of the meeting that the Exposition be postponed. Final action in the matter was referred to the proper committee of the National Association.

"P. A. Powers, in advocating the stopping of production for a period of thirty to sixty days brought out the following points in favor of such a move: Production costs now run from seven hundred thousand to seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars a week. The industry which is now straining its credit strings would therefore be able to get a healthy breathing spell. Plenty of film is now waiting on the shelves for the theatres to run on. This, alone, would go far towards solving the big general problem of overproduction and unused film. Through the switching around of services which would naturally occur, many subjects would be brought to the people in many sections who have never seen them. A big first-run house in New York City, for instance, could use many excellent subjects never shown by them. If necessary, they could make changes two or three times instead of once every week. The only loss in shutting off production would be felt by the players. In the case of the high priced stars, at least, there would be no actual suffering. So far as the Government is concerned, Mr. Powers's idea was to make a virtue of necessity. He had forecast inevitable action upon the part of the Government in closing down the studios temporarily. His idea was to send a delegation to Washington and offer the Government a voluntary shutting down of production, which action on the part of the industry would not only be greatly appreciated, but would forestall arbitrary action on the Government's part later on."

IT'S UNANIMOUS!

From Far-off Japan, from the Independent Field and a Blunt Statement that Speaks Volumes

HERE are a few quotations from letters so unusual that you won't want to miss.

From The Film Graphic, Tokio, Japan, we hear: "We are glad to say that in Japan 'Motion Picture News' is the most popular foreign motion picture weekly and everybody wishes to see it."

From The Consolidated Amusement & Supply Co., of Springfield, Illinois: "We are pleased to advise that business has been quite good with us this year, and we can trace several sales directly to information obtained from the 'News.'"

And here's a statement that for its very bluntness warmed our hearts for an entire coalless day:

"As I have leased my theatre to Mr. R. F. Weitzel, I am sending you a small news item:

"'I. D. Howard, manager and owner of the Isis theatre, Winimac, Indiana, after six years' steady grind with success, has leased his house to Prof. R. F. Weitzel for one year. Mr. Howard expects to find something else in the field and is open to any proposition.

"'He also states that success has come through the help of this trade paper!'"

Universal Temporarily Lays Off Producing Forces

"Not counting any new negatives started during the past week at Universal City, we now have on hand enough first-class five-reel feature pictures to take care of all release dates up to next August," said President Carl Laemmle in a statement issued from the Universal offices.

"For that reason and also to avoid unnecessary producing during the expensive rainy season, we have temporarily laid off all companies except those producing Bluebirds and Universal serials.

"By this plan, we kill two birds with one stone. We eliminate the terrible waste that has hitherto been unavoidable during the rainy season when hundreds of people had to be carried on the payroll but could not be used on account of bad weather. Second, we also meet the request of the Government Fuel Administrator to conserve coal in every industry, for under this plan, we will require but one-third as much power as we have used in previous seasons.

"This year we have been fortunate because the rainy season instead of starting in December, held off until this month, giving us four extra weeks in which to work at full blast. This has given us an opportunity to get farther ahead on high-class five-reel negatives than we have ever been since the organization of the company.

"When the rainy season is over and we have nearly used up our reserve supply of five-reel negatives, the force at Universal City will again be increased so that we can make all of next winter's pictures before January, 1919."

"Eagle's Eye" Pronounced a Strong Serial

The first three episodes of "The Eagle's Eye," a serial written by William J. Flynn, formerly Chief of the United States Secret Service, and produced by Wharton, Inc., were shown to the trade last week at the Strand Theatre. King Baggott and Marguerite Snow are the featured players.

The story tells of the activities of the German spies in this country and the important happenings, including the sinking of the Lusitania and the plot to destroy the naval fleet as it left New York harbor after the naval review in 1914. The first three episodes mark the serial as one of quality and possessing an interest for all. A full review of the first showing will appear in the next issue of the MOTION PICTURE NEWS.

Eugene Roth Visits New York

Criticises Trade Papers for What He Terms Unwitting Errors Concerning Exhibitor and Producing Conditions

EUGENE H. Roth, manager of the California theatre and the Portola theatre of San Francisco, Cal., arrived in New York last week.

Readers of Motion Picture News are well acquainted with Mr. Roth's new California theatre, which is at once the pride of Filmdom on the Pacific Coast, and second to no other theatre in the country in capacity and beauty of appointments.

Mr. Roth is in New York on a vacation trip, but he seems to be very busily calling upon the trade and has an eye on the presentation of pictures in New York's leading photoplay houses.

Mr. Roth takes the stand that there is a very close and sympathetic identity of interest between the producer and exhibitor—the exhibitor on the one hand must have an assurance of pictures for the future, adequate to the needs of his house; the producer on the other hand must be encouraged to furnish this permanent and adequate supply. Business, he says, is excellent on the Pacific Coast, and contrary to his expectations, he finds the headquarters of the industry here in New York in a fairly secure and cheerful frame of mind. In this connection Mr. Roth offers a criticism of the trade papers. They have unknowingly, he says, given the impression throughout the country, that the producing and distributing branches of the industry are in a shaky condition. It is unwise, he believes, to create such an impression throughout the field, especially when there is little to warrant an impression of industrial chaos.

Mr. Roth was very much interested in the presentation of Tabloid Operas at the Strand theatre, and compliments Mr. Edel upon his origination of this very entertaining novelty. He took occasion to compliment Motion Picture News upon a recent editorial, entitled "Give Us Entertaining Pictures." The public demand, says Mr. Roth, is for plays of heart interest and rapid action. The over serious, and especially the morbid and depressing themes are not wanted. He lays considerable emphasis upon the value of the star, but he also emphasizes the importance of the vehicle. This is the day, in his belief, of the large theatre in large centers, but he calls attention to the possibility and danger of over-competition in the buildings of large houses so near together.

During his stay in the metropolis, Mr. Roth visited the executive offices of the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation and contracted for the three special U. S. releases, the subjects "The Zeppelin's Last Raid," "Those Who Pay," and the Sidney Olcott drama "The Belgian."

Pathe Uses Paralta Studios

Arrangement Considered Step in Centralization of Pathe Activities—Four Companies Ready to Begin Work on Features

J. A. BERST, vice-president and general manager of Pathe, announced last week that arrangements have been completed with Carl Anderson, president, and Robert Brunton, manager of productions of Paralta, for the production of features in the Paralta's new studio in Hollywood, Cal.

This arrangement is regarded by Pathe as the first step in the direction of a centralization of its production activities and a further means of assuring the steady supply of bigger and better pictures.

Four of the companies now engaged in Pathe Plays will shortly start work in the Paralta studios. Bryant Washburn will be the first. It is reported that Fannie Ward, Frank Keenan and Bessie Love, who are now working in the Pathe studios in the East, will be sent West within the next month under the new arrangement.

Mr. Berst and Mr. Anderson, in announcing the arrangement, emphasized the fact that it is in no sense a combination of any sort.

"With the Eastern studios of Pathe and the Astra Company and the Paralta studios in the West," said Mr. Berst, "it will be possible for us to have a greater variety of pictures than we could get by confining our production activities to one section of the country. There are some pictures that can be made to better advantage in the East and these productions, as in the past, will be entrusted to the Astra Film Corporation which has done highly satisfactory work for us. Other stories, however, requiring either Western setting or the scenery that can only be found in California, can be made better in the West.

"For some time past there has been a growing belief that a great deal of the present waste in production could be eliminated by centralizing production activities in two or three studios."

Kane Gets Tribute from California

Arthur S. Kane, general manager of the Select Pictures Corporation, received last week from Folsom Prison, in California, what he considers an unique tribute to the general excellence of Select productions.

The tribute came in the form of a large white card upon which, lettered and illumined, was an appreciation from the men of Folsom. It was forwarded through Harry H. Hicks, Select's San Francisco manager. The card, mounted on a brilliant red folder and tied with green ribbon, presents a Christmas-y appearance in thorough accord with the good wishes expressed, and the signatures of several hundred inmates have been written in around the margin.

Directors Give Supper and Dance

Interest has been aroused in New York picture circles concerning the invitation supper and dance which the Motion Picture Directors' Association has planned for the Biltmore Hotel on January 26.

At the meeting of the Association last week Director J. Searle Dawley, on receiving the report of Chairman Wally Van of the dance committee, expressed his conviction that the affair would establish a new standard for similar events.

Mrs. Miller on Ohio Censor Board

Mrs. Maude Murray Miller has been elected chairman of the Ohio Board of Censors to succeed Charles G. Williams, who has served in that capacity. When the censorship law became effective in Ohio in 1913, Mrs. Miller was the first member appointed by Governor Cox. She served also under Governor Willis, and when Governor Cox was re-elected, one of his first acts after his second inauguration in 1917 was to reappoint Mrs. Miller as member of the Ohio Board of Censors.

Exposition Put Off Till September?

National Association of Motion Picture Industry Decides on Postponement—September 7th to 13th Likely—Reports Indicated Financial Success

THE National Association of the Motion Picture Industry at a meeting held Wednesday night, January 16, attended by representative producers and other branches of the industry, decided that the exposition planned for February 2 to 10 at the Grand Central Palace, would not be held. After the meeting the following telegram was sent to the members:

"At meeting motion picture producers and distributors held to-night, representatively attended, it was voted as sense of meeting that upon patriotic grounds exposition scheduled for February 2 to 10 should not be held, and that meeting exposition company directors and all parties who have contracted for space should be held eight o'clock Friday evening, 18th, 806 Times Building, New York, to take final action. Wire if you will attend.

"(Signed) FREDERICK H. ELLIOTT,
General Manager."

The report made at this meeting indicated that the exposition would be a financial success, but it was decided that the general situation in regard to fuel, food and transportation, owing to the war, was in such a state as to make it inadvisable to hold the show at this time. The action taken at this meeting was not final, and in order to determine definitely the pleasure of the majority a special meeting was called for Friday night at the National Association's headquarters in the Times Building.

At the meeting Friday night, representative men from the producing companies were present and the situation was discussed pro and con. The majority of the members were in favor of calling off the exposition, but after further discussion it was practically decided that a postponement would be the better plan. It was suggested that the exposition be postponed until April, but this action was objected to because the time was too near that set for the Boston exposition in July.

M. Ridder, of the Grand Central Palace, was called to the meeting for suggestion as to the most advantageous solution of the problem and to get his opinion as to possibility of postponement to a future date. Mr. Ridder suggested that the Palace was open for engagement during the middle of September. This suggestion met with approval, but definite action was not taken, pending further discussion of important details concerning liquidation of accounts for floor space. The meeting was adjourned until Monday afternoon at 3 o'clock.

No statement was issued by Mr. Elliott after the meeting scheduled for Monday afternoon. Mr. Elliott said early in the afternoon that he doubted whether there would be a sufficient number of members present to definitely decide concerning the date to which the exposition would be postponed. When Monday was set for the adjourned meeting the members were under the impression that on Monday the theatres would be closed. The Monday opening of theatres prevented many from being present.

There was every indication that the exposition would have been a big financial success, according to reports submitted by Frederick H. Elliott, general manager. Nearly every producing company, firms carrying accessory supplies, lithograph companies, trade papers and every branch of the industry had contracted for floor space and promised their support.

In view of the fact that the fuel situation was acute and there existed an uncertainty as to further action which the Government might find it necessary to take in conserving the fuel supply, the Association considered it advisable to postpone the show until such further date as would lend itself with less uncertainty then the dates which had been set for the exposition—February 2nd to 10th.

The transportation problem was an important factor in determining the action taken. It was to be doubted whether representative film men who desired to be represented at the exposition would find the means of travel convenient for them, especially those coming from Chicago and more distant points. In the case of the accessory people, many of them are located in Chicago and points further distant from New York. These companies might have found the situation such as to not alone delay them in transporting their exhibits to New York, but they had reason to doubt whether their product would reach the place of exposition at all.

The action taken was the result of the critical conditions existing in the fuel market and the Association's desire to cooperate with the Government in conserving the supply. Members represented at the meeting were of the unanimous opinion that in view of such conditions, there should be no attempt on the industry's part to leave room for doubt as to their sincerity in desiring to co-operate with the Government and Dr. Garfield in the matter of fuel conservation. All voted to stand their pro rata share of the expense incident to the preliminary arrangements.

After the suggestion was offered that the exposition be postponed until September, each was of the opinion that this was the better plan. The present difficulties will have been overcome, said one member, and there should be no reason why the exposition will not prove to be bigger and better. Approval by the board of directors, a certainty, is now all that is needed.

AN ALL-YEAR-ROUND "EXPO"

Brief Interviews with a Few in Attendance at the Big Show During the Coming Year

OF course, the Grand Central Palace show has been called off. It's too bad! But we know where there is an all-year-round Exposition—with hundreds of brilliant exhibits changing each week and eleven thousand odd film men in attendance every week.

If you don't know where this show is held here are some exclusive interviews with a few of those in attendance:

F. D. Eager, General Manager, Acme Amusement Co., Lincoln, Nebraska—"I read the 'News' with interest every issue, and congratulate you on the splendid work you are doing for the good of the industry."

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Gardner, Arc theatre, Delphi, Indiana—"We are enclosing subscription for the 'News.' The absolutely best trade paper published. May the coming year bring to you and yours health, happiness and prosperity. And in the words of Tiny Tim, 'God Bless Us Every One.'"

William Tifft, Vaudette theatre, Sterling, Illinois—"The 'News' is the best exhibitors' book out. Have had it for two years and find it always fair to all."

F. W. Lillibridge, Fairmount News, Fairmount, Indiana—"The quality of the 'News' has improved so much that it is impossible to be without it."

And so on—"ad infinitum."

Piedmont's New Management Plans Efficiency

Piedmont Pictures Corporation, now under new management, announces that their new plans have been perfected and a detailed announcement will be made soon. The new managment of the Piedmont Corporation have made plans whereby the company will be placed in closer touch with the producer and for extending its export business. Unlimited funds, it is announced, are at the executives disposal.

Representatives of Piedmont's various agencies, including the Far East, will be located in New York and the producer will have the opportunity of meeting these representatives, personally and the conditions as they exist in foreign countries. An exchange in ideas will work to the advantage of all concerned.

It is contended by the Piedmont Corporation that the returns from the world market are not commensurate with the outlay and that it is the main purpose of this organization to solve this problem and get the maximum percentage from the investment.

Parsons Leases "Broadway"

William Parsons, President of National Film Corporation of America, Leases Broadway for Extended Run of "Tarzan of the Apes"

WILLIAM PARSONS, president of the National Film Corporation of America, announces that he has closed a contract with Carl Laemmle, of Universal, for a lease of the Broadway theatre for an extended run of "Tarzen of the Apes," which will open at this theatre on January 27. Two performances will be given daily, after the opening night. The top price for admission at the evening show will be $1.50, and for the matinee, 75 cents.

Mr. Parsons announces that the lobby of the Broadway theatre will be transformed into a miniature jungle as an appropriate display for his production. The scenes of "Tarzan of the Apes" are laid in the jungle and present a most unusual subject on the screen.

Mr. Parsons said:

"Six hundred thousand cards printed on velvet stock, in rosin off-set type and announcing the forthcoming presentation of the piece, will reach New York homes this week, while the New York Bill Posting Company and various other agencies have been drawn on for display matter.

"The daily paper campaign is to be the most unique ever instituted in the city. Harry Reichenbach, who is in charge of all exploitation for the film, is trying out a novel plan.

"For the first time, hotel and ticket agencies are to be used to the fullest extent and the theatre lobby and front display is another innovation in that plaster plaques are to be used instead of photographic enlargements. Four of the lions and one of the panthers killed in the action of the piece, have been mounted and taxadermized and will be on display at the theatre while all the Riker-Hegeman windows throughout New York are to carry colored enlargements of scenes of the piece.

"A special score for thirty pieces of music, incidental and symphonic, has been arranged and a special orchestra of soloists gotten together by direction of Otto Landau. The music is characteristic of the play and is replete with wierd jungle strains. Enid Markey and Elmo Lincoln, two of the big cast, are expected in New York for the opening."

"Eagle's Eye" Progressing Fast

Leopold Wharton, of Wharton, Inc., Says That It Is Greatest Serial He Has Made—Three Episodes Shown to Trade—Hundred Episodes If Necessary

LEOPOLD WHARTON has returned to New York from the Wharton Studios at Ithaca, where he had spent a week in connection with the production of this firm's serial photodrama, "The Eagle's Eye," founded on Chief Flynn's story exposing the Imperial German Government's spy system in this country.

Mr. Wharton expressed himself as very much pleased over the progress made in filming the production. Speaking of what had been done, Mr. Wharton said: "We have made several very successful serials in the past, but 'The Eagle's Eye' is by far the best work we have ever done and I am confident that it will prove the greatest success of any serial we have ever produced. With the material we have, we can make 'The Eagle's Eye' run a hundred episodes, if we desire.

"This serial differs very materially from anything ever before produced for the screen. It really may be classed as news reels, for we show actual events in the investigations of the Secret Service framed in a powerful fictional dramatic setting. In this way we gain the forces of fact coincident with the interest that an intensely dramatic romantic story always carries. We not only show what Imperial Germany's spies plotted to do, and the incidents of their conspiracies, but we go further and show what would have happened had not Chief Flynn and his operatives succeeded in frustrating these plots.

"The actual news interests of the serial are carried by the impersonations of von Bernstorff, von Papen, Boy-Ed and Dr. Albert.

"A very interesting point in this connection is that these four notable characters are played by artists selected because of their very close resemblance to the Imperial German officials whom they impersonate.

"To speed up the production as fast as possible consistent with the best possible results in dramatic action and photography, we now have four directors at work on the picture—my brother Theodore, Wellington Playter, George Lessey and myself. I will continue to make the special scenes in New York and other cities the story requires, while the other three directors work at our studios at Ithaca. In this way we will be able to gain much time."

Hamlin Comes East in Circuit Interest

Thomas J. Hamlin, of Minneapolis, who is secretary and general manager of the Associated Theatres, Inc., arrived in New York, January 22, in the interest of his company. The organization embraces nearly seven hundred theatres in the states of Minnesota, Wisconsin, North Dakota and South Dakota, and is now organizing Iowa, Nebraska, Montana and northern Michigan.

Mr. Hamlin announced that the several film exchanges of the company will be opened on January 28.

Irwin Denies Amalgamation of Exchanges

There will be no amalgamation or consolidation of the Vitagraph Company's Canadian exchanges with any other exchanges whatsoever. This authorized statement comes from the office of Walter W. Irwin, general manager of the Vitagraph distributing organization, and is in response to rumors that have been current for some time past.

It is said that while in the past year a number of propositions were submitted to the Vitagraph company looking toward some sort of a consolidation of Canadian exchanges, nevertheless, none of them were regarded as a satisfactory substitute for the present arrangement of Vitagraph indivi-ual exchanges. Mr. Irwin states that Vitagraph's Canadian offices are handling their business splendidly, and that no suggestion for consolidation has at any time been made which offers the Vitagraph company anything like the advantages it is enjoying with its own distributing organization.

King Knights William F. Jury

The issue of The Bioscope under date of January 3 carries an account of the knighting by His Majesty King George of William F. Jury, of Jury's Imperial Pictures, of London.

It is understood the honor of knighthood was bestowed upon Mr. Jury because of his commendable activities in using his battle pictures for the benefit of national war charities.

Woods Shows "Innocent" in New York

Pathe Plays were given an auspicious inauguration January 20 when A. H. Woods presented Fannie Ward in "Innocent" at the Eltings theatre in New York to an invited audience composed of theatrical people and others.

Three years ago at the same theatre Mr. Woods presented the legitimate production of "Innocent."

In and Out of Town

M. G. Watkins, France Films, Inc., returned to New York last week from Chicago, where he had been on business in the interest of the company.

E. V. Richards, general manager, Saenger Amusement Company, New Orleans, representative of the First National Exhibitors' Circuit's branch in that city, arrived in New York last week.

Eugene Roth, of San Francisco, was a New York visitor.

Harry Crandall, of Washington, D. C., ran over to the Big Burg for the First National meeting.

Frank Rembusch, of Indiana, dropped in for a few words at the NEWS office.

Allied Conference Calls Rembusch East

Frank Rembusch, general manager of the American Exhibitors' Association with headquarters in the Indiana Trust Building, Indianapolis, Indiana, was in New York last week in attendance upon the Allied Exhibitor's Legislative Committee, which was appointed at the recent convention in Washington. The committee, of which Mr. Varner is chairman and Mr. Rembusch is secreary, includes Messrs. Lee A. Ochs, Ernest Horstman and J. H. O'Donnell. The committee has in preparation a brief which is to be sent to Mr. Varner at Washington in an effort to revise and make more equitable the present war tax.

Mr. Rembusch states that some 400 exhibitors have been heard from, having sent in reports in accordance with the announcement recently published in the trade papers. Still more of these reports are needed. Mr. Rembusch urges that all exhibitors send these in as soon as possible. A number of smaller exhibitors seem to feel that their reports are not needed. This, Mr. Rembusch assures them, is not the case. Reports from the small houses are particularly needed.

Speaking of the American Exhibitors' Association, Mr. Rembusch said that there is steady activity at the headquarters in the Indiana Trust Building, Indianapolis. A convention of the association will be held later on in Detroit. No exposition will be held in connection with the convention. It is to be purely a business meeting. It is also the policy of the association that no expositions calling upon the manufacturer for space are to be held in future.

The various state organizations under the banner of the American Exhibitors' Association are in better shape than ever before, many reporting the largest membership rolls in their history.

The Allied Exhibitors' Legislative Committee has been charged with the duty of gathering the exact truth of how the war tax is affecting motion picture theatres, with a view of securing readjustment.

Olive Thomas in New York for Rest

Olive Thomas, who has been presented successfully in several Triangle productions, is in New York with her husband, Jack Pickford, for a brief vacation.

During the past ten months Miss Thomas has appeared in seven five-reel features for Triangle, the last of which was "An Heiress for a Day."

Alan Hale Engaged for Part in "Moral Suicide"

Alan Hale has been engaged by Ivan Abramson of the Graphic Film Corporation to play the part of "Lucky" Travers in "Moral Suicide." Mr. Abramson's latest effort is a virile, powerful problem story of to-day. Mr. Hale's splendid work with Zena Keefe, who won great fame as the wronged girl in "Enlighten Thy Daughter," resulted in praise from the critics everywhere.

RUSH! SPECIAL! BING! BANG!

Being the Story of One Telegram and of an Exhibitor Who Wants What He Wants—Quick!

IT was Tuesday, January 15. The merry hum of ceaseless activity was heard in MOTION PICTURE NEWS office. A Western Union boy appeared in the doorway. "A kick from some press agent," said Ye Editor, bored-like, as he opened the telegram. "Let's see—what's this?" And he read:

Greenville, Texas, 12 P. M., Jan. 14, 1918.

Motion Picture News,
729 Seventh Avenue, New York:
"News" January Twelfth Lost in Mail. Can't Live Without It.
CRYSTAL AMUSEMENT COMPANY.

So we saved a life by rushing off a substitute copy of MOTION PICTURE NEWS for January 12. Which reminded us of another exhibitor who wants what he wants—and wants it quick.

Eugene Roth—some call him the Rothapfel of the Coast—has his MOTION PICTURES NEWS sent to him by Special Delivery mail each week. It costs him $5.20 extra for the year—but he says it's worth it. Modestly—we agree with him.

We'll do the same for you, Mr. Reader, and be glad to do it.

First of Shorty Hamilton Comedies Ready

Producing in their own plant in California, and with the first series of pictures completed, and enough under way to insure delivery up to June, 1918, the W. H. Clifford Photoplay Company is in position to keep faith with all state rights buyers, and release on schedule for the United States and Canadian exhibitors. Realizing that when the bookings are arranged for the first release, the work is practically done for the year, the keenest and most prominent buyers are contracting for the entire series.

Nathan H. Gordon, Globe Film Company, Boston, and manager of the Olympia theatre circuit, has purchased the rights for New England, and will open in his Boston houses. Other buyers are doing likewise, and over practically 60 per cent of the territory is now sold. The list will shortly be announced for the benefit of exhibitors everywhere.

Ernest Shipman, who is handling the sales, says:

"We are in no particular hurry to dispose of these franchises, as the more the buyers realize the demand for these Shorty Hamilton five-reel stories, the more thoroughly will they do business, and as there is but one price to all alike we will wait to close the remainder of the territory with the best organized organizations."

Boy Scouts' Show at Strand Theatre

The Boy Scouts of America presented an invitation showing at the Strand theatre in New York on the morning of January 22 of a ten-reel dramatic serial called "Boy Scouts to the Rescue, or Aids of the Nation."

It is said that the picture will be issued later as a five-part serial, two reels to an episode, by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

Goldwyn Representative Comes East

Harry Leonhardt, general western manager of Goldwyn Pictures, with headquarters in Los Angeles, has been called East and is now on a special commission for his organization in New England, and temporarily stationed in Boston. Mr. Leonhardt has direction for Goldwyn of the Denver, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Seattle zones.

Michigan Exhibitors Ask Action by U. S.

Flaying exhibition conditions and placing the blame on the war tax and the "star system," and charging that the certain producing and distributing companies are charging an unreasonable amount for their product, the American Exhibitors' Association of Michigan and Detroit, meeting at Jackson, Mich., January 8, adopted lengthy resolutions setting forth their contentions with the demand that they be called to the attention of the Allied Exhibitors' Legislative Committee to be brought before Government authorities.

This committee is directed to see "that the proper Government officials be asked to take such action as will obtain relief to the exhibitor from the present monopolistic and unfair methods of trade to the end that the Government will receive the highest possible aid through the screens, stages and taxes of the motion picture theatre, and of which we believe will help win the war, and that we believe the motion picture industry should be put on a war basis." In addition the attorney for the Association was directed to investigate the situation to see what action could be taken in Michigan.

Paramount and Artcraft are particularly mentioned in the resolutions.

Hart Feature Ready for Release

W. H. Productions Announces the First W. S. Hart Feature, "The Two-Gun Man" in "The Bargain" Ready for Release —Others Will Follow

THE first of the Hart super-features, "The Two-Gun Man" in "The Bargain," is shortly to be released by W. H. Productions Company. It has all the attributes of the best things in pictures—exceptional scenic beauty, compelling interesting story and a perfect cast. Considerable footage is given over to situations in an elaborate western gambling hall, and the incidentals throughout the entire picture move in remarkable speed and frequency to the effective climax. Despite the large number of action passages, the whole is exceptionally well developed as a unit, and escapes the episodic quality often apparent in action photoplays.

William S. Hart is the "Two-Gun Man," a desperado, who refuses under the influence of love. The picture was taken in the Grand Canyon of Arizona, where most of the scenes obtained are not familiar to the public, so that they give the picture an air of decided freshness.

Clara Williams, as the girl; J. Barney Sherry, as the father; J. Frank Burke, as the sheriff, and James Dowling, as the travelling minister, are leading characters in support of Mr. Hart.

The advertising matter for "The Two-Gun Man" in "The Bargain" will consist of two styles each of one sheets, three sheets, six sheets, and a wonderful twenty-four sheet; a lobby display consisting of ten 8 x 10 photographs, with two title cards, six 11 x 14 photographs, and two 22 x 28 photographs.

In addition to this the W. H. Productions Company will put out for the benefit of the exchanges and the exhibitors a twenty-page campaign book on not only this production but on each of the other Hart productions. This book will cover a complete campaign for the exhibitor in order to help him put his picture over.

The second and third of the Hart super-features are nearly complete. "The Bandit and the Preacher," in which Mr. Hart is supported by Robert Edeson, Rhea Mitchell, Gladys Brockwell and Herschall Mayall; and "The Hell Hound of Alaska," in which Mr. Hart is supported by Enid Markey.

"Advertising Important Item"

Frank Hall, President of U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation, Says That Advertising Is Essential to Success of Picture

AN advertising and publicity campaign nation-wide in scope and embracing the use of billboards, magazines, daily newspapers, trade publications and special circularization, is being arranged by Frank Hall, president and general manager of the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation as an exhibitor aid in the exploitation of the special releases, "The Zeppelin's Last Raid," "Those Who Pay" and "The Belgian."

"The success of special productions such as we distribute," said Mr. Hall, "depends largely upon adveritising. We have made it a point in the selection of our subjects to take only such productions that readily lend themselves to intensive exploitation."

"For instance, 'The Zeppelin's Last Raid' is built around a most timely subject. It is readily apparent that an exhibitor can put a maximum amount of advertising behind such a production and reap a profit.

"Our second production, 'Those Who Pay,' while possessing nothing of a spectacular nature is founded upon a subject of unusual heart appeal and lends itself to extraordinary advertising. The third U. S. release, 'The Belgian,' inasmuch as it is a subject of momentous timeliness, is excellent exploitation material, and it is our intention to promote these productions to the limit.

"Special productions, even more than program subjects, require special advertising.

"It is my belief that most productions in order to be an extraordinary success at the box office today must of necessity possess a big scene, a climax about which all the advertising may be built.

"Despite disquieting reports from some quarters I find that the exhibitors who book special productions and are advertising them liberally, have no cause for complaint. The advertising appropriation is the last item of expense the exhibitor should reduce. Advertising, in my opinion, both as an exhibitor and a distributor of motion pictures, is well nigh as important as the picture itself. The exhibitor who books a picture that lends itself to big advertising and then fails to take advantage of the opportunity for exceptional exploitation is lacking in showmanship."

The U. S. advertising campaign also will be extended into the foreign territory, in which phase of work it will co-operate with the Robertson-Cole Company of New York and London, to which the foreign territorial rights have been distributed.

"Natural Law," Foreign Rights Sold

Charles H. France, president of France Films, Inc., and Sidney Garrett, president of J. Frank Brockliss, Inc., last week closed a deal whereby the latter concern acquires from the former the entire foreign rights to the France Films production, "The Natural Law," recently shown to the trade at the Broadway theatre, New York.

Marguerite Courtot has the leading feminine role in the production, and Howard Hall and George Larkin are prominently cast.

Lamberger Speaks for Industry

DR. O. I. LAMBERGER, representative of Ivan Film Productions, Inc., makes some pertinent remarks on present conditions in the industry, in the following interview:

"There are a lot of loquacious people who are complaining of business methods and of the general condition of the industry. Since we live in a democracy, any one has a right to crow as much as he likes or keep silent, but it is the opinion of at least those connected with the Ivan Film Productions that instead of crowing and complaining, it would be much better to get right down to brass tacks and really look the situation in the face, and if conditions are as some say they are, to solve the problem, and if they are not, to remain silent.

"It has always been a fact—especially in this country—that when any group or groups of men seek to dominate a field of industry merely by power of 'big money' and the installation of a trust, or commonly in our industry known as a 'programme system,' they always finally had to recognize their limitations and to take the place where they properly belong. The only thing in art that conclusively will amount and does, and ever will amount to anything, will be art. It will be merit of production.

"The independent manufacturer in our industry must always bear in mind that at least nine-tenths of his productions must all be big winners. It is the independent manufacturer more than any one else that is in the position of making super-features. He is not called upon by any iron-cast rule to produce so and so many pictures to fill up so and so large a programme. He knows he is expected to bring forth something that will make men sit up and listen. He knows that his production will immediately be compared to the very best efforts of the largest companies, and his picture must prove to be the superior to receive recognition.

Suffice it to say that the Ivan Film Productions, having arrived at the top rung of independent manufacturers, under the general supervision of I. E. Chadwick, its general manager, while having decided to be unsparing in expenditures so far as actual production is concerned, will take a lead in the proposed co-operative movement between producer and exhibitor.

Douglass Color Film for New York

It was announced from San Rafael, Cal., last week, that a New York trade showing of natural color films under the process invented by Leon Forrest Douglass, has been arranged for February 4 and on the two mornings to follow. These presentations, which are expected to create much interest in picture circles, will be given at the Wurlitzer Fine Arts theatre, 120 West Fortieth street, at ten o'clock on the mornings named. The Douglass Natural Color Film Company, Ltd., is controlling the films, which have been shown in San Francisco, and were well received there.

What Kind of a Fellow Is—Freuler?

By William A. Johnston

ONCE we told John R. Freuler a story. It was a funny story and we expected to get a laugh.

To our chagrin—for we had put Mr. Freuler's ever ready smile down as indicating a facile sense of humor—Mr. Freuler rebuked us with an introspective solemnity, said "Ah, yes!" politely and introduced us to a serious man who wanted to know what we thought of the market for one-reel comedies.

Six months later we met Mr. Freuler in Washington—one of a peripatetic crowd, and he winked at us frequently during the day. That evening we sat with him in the dining car to New York and he laughed right in his soup—over that six-months-old story.

Which might indicate, that Mr. Freuler, like the fabled Englishman, enjoys his spring jokes in the fall.

Not so, it seems that Mr. Freuler filed that story away for future reference and enjoyment—at the proper time.

Mr. Freuler is a cataloguer. He works as fast and definitely as a card index system. In fact, we might call him the Globe Wernicke of the film industry.

He even files his Presidencies and Directorships—which is going some.

In one drawer of his systematic desk is a card index to twenty-four corporations of which he is a god-father, papa, uncle or cousin. They are mostly film companies, with a sprinkling of dye and munitions concerns.

Right here we mention Mr. Freuler's smile.

It is a large, comfortable, come right - in - and - sit-down smile. It is like the smile of a successful plate-passer in church. When Mr. Freuler smiles you are perfectly willing to hand him a quarter. It is a receptive smile. It seems to invite money as well as comfort and confidence.

So, to a keen psychologist, there may be quite a connection between Mr. Freuler's smile and the twenty-four smiling corporations of which he is an intimate relative; also between his rise from a four hundred and fifty dollar store theatre to the presidency of a $3,500,000 corporation.

He has smiled himself up and along in the world.

And he smiles his way clear through you, too.

As we were studying Mr. Freuler we had a feeling that, behind his smile he was X-raying us.

We felt conscious that we needed a hair cut; and we knew too that he didn't like the way we toyed with our watch chain.

We have an idea that when Mr. Freuler concluded his $675,000 deal with one Charles Chaplin he told Charley not to bulge his vest pocket with his chewing tobacco and then sent him out to get a fresh shoe shine.

We also have an idea that we'll select Mr. Freuler to write us up.

If he has ever seen you he can tell what kind of a fellow you are: that's the kind of a fellow he is.

He catalogues away all these little points of observation—little things that count but are usually overlooked. Then he forgets them—till he wants to use them. He cultivates this temporary forgetfulness. That leaves his mind free for major problems.

A very good idea!

THINGS THEY SAY ABOUT HIM

He's a practical man, is John R.

A darn busy man; a hustling, practical optimist.

He knows the film business.

He's a good figurer.

He doesn't play poker; but if he did he'd be particularly good at spotting four flushes.

He's a go-getter.

And he smiles—smiles—smiles.

He's square — the old man is. I can't boost him enough.

Has eyes like an eagle—one glance and he'll tell you whether you smoke, drink or chew.

If we make a poor picture that's just the one he'll see in a theatre — and then there's lightning.

When he visits New York he stops at a hotel most film men never saw. Why? Oh, he's here on business — and every minute counts.

Needs a whole flock of private secretaries—for he saves his mind for the big things.

The least of his worries is what the other film "magnuts" think of him.

He discovered Dennis Sullivan — that's some achievement.

Rembusch Writes on Success

As First of Six Articles on Questions of Importance American Association Uses "Survival of the Fittest"

F you want to survive—organize" is the way Frank J. Rembusch, of the American Exhibitors' Association, of Indianapolis, summarizes the first of a series of six articles which he is preparing for Motion Picture News, and which will touch on various questions of importance at the present time.

"The Survival of the Fittest" is the title of the first, and is as follows:

Some one a few years back said, "Most folk who remain in this film and picture business long enough finally go broke." All along these years we have continually heard, "It will be the survival of the fittest." A trade journal man said to me less than a month ago, "It may be necessary for many small theatres in the smaller cities to go out of business entirely, and those cities will be without pictures for some time, when some one else will come along with more energy and start a new theatre."

A producer writes me, "I read with interest your New Year Appeal and can see the situation of the old lady to whom you refer. Conditions will necessarily force some one out of the business. It will probably be a benefit to her in the end, as I feel myself that the motion picture business is not the most lucrative business in the world. The returns which one derives from it and the amount of energy and effort directed to this business does not make it the best business in the world to invest money in. To the production end of the business the writer has yet to learn as to the first one who really made any substantial amount of money from the industry and got away with it."

The producer has up to three or four years ago made money in the millions out of producing. He has evidently stayed in long enough to lose a great deal of it and looks now to "the survival of the fittest."

We picture folks always look at things in our own little selfish angle, and when we say "the survival of the fittest" we always believe that we will survive and the other man is unfit. The question then is, Which is the fittest? I have seen a large theatre of eighteen hundred seats open next to a small theatre of five hundred seats. The large theatre spent forty thousand dollars in fixing up and beautifying an already very handsome building. They put in a symphony orchestra, sweet singers and flowers galore; the pictures had wonderful settings in the way of scenery, velvet curtains, etc.; they bought the best program on the market—that is if we judge program by price, and after burning up something like fifty thousand dollars in losses they closed the picture show and ran burlesque. The other little show was frightened at this monster that opened. They had been running several years on short programs, but the fact is that this little show, like a tin lizzie, went right along, turned on a little more gas and went faster and better than ever, and is still going. Now, the question is: Which was the fittest of the two and why did the little one survive? My interpretation would be that the big show was trying to play to the highbrows and there didn't happen to be enough de luxe patrons to appreciate their de luxe performances, while there were plenty of common, ordinary people who liked the little short programs in that city, and therefore they survived.

Now, it seems to us that the idea "the survival of the fittest" is wrong from every standpoint. If there are only going to be a few survive, who is going to take all this film service, and if it should happen that the fittest didn't survive the industry will be in worse shape than ever. The more picture shows there are the more program will be absorbed, or the better chance the good picture has to be profitable, because it is a better chance for wider distribution. Production costs are based on engagements per each section. Every time a picture house closes out and the town has no show that city is no longer supporting the cost of production, and therefore the big houses have to make it up.

In addition to this, people get out of the habit, and that is very bad, as any exhibitor will tell you. Folks that go to shows in the little towns go to the big shows in the big towns. The Circle here in Indianapolis, one of the most beautiful theatres in the United States, has a clientele from outside of the city that probably amounts to thirty per cent of its gross receipts. And so it is everywhere.

Among the producers we find every one wishing that he would survive and the other fellow be unfit, and the exhibitors have helped some producers to survive who were unfit, and some fit and fair dealing producers to die. The producer has a start at a fair salary and is able to give us fine pictures at a reasonable figure, in fact, through these pictures he makes the star, and the exhibitor helps make the star. Along comes another producer who offers the star a bigger salary, comes to the exhibitor with a bigger lot of bunk than any other one has ever brought out before, charges three times more for his pictures with this star, and we so far have been going right along helping the new producer. The producer who gave us those good pictures with this star at reasonable figures couldn't raise his service to meet the new salary offered the star, because we wouldn't pay it to him. Am I right? Evidently then there is more money in starting a pictures show and starting the film business than to run a picture show or to continue to produce pictures. It seems to be that way because when a new picture show opens everybody goes to see it and stays with it quite a while. So it seems a man will be fit for a while, and then he becomes unfit in this business; that the old show saying, "Chickens today and feathers tomorrow," applies very much to pictures.

"The survival of the fittest" is the most selfish and unbusinesslike thing that can be said in any business. Those who give the best of their life to a business are entitled to live by it, but this business will never be a stable affair until exhibitors join hands in some business manner by which they franchise their theatres and protect themselves. This industry should be under some form of control, but the exhibitors don't want the producers to control them, and I don't blame them, because they don't even control themselves, and that would be a case of the tail wagging the dog anyhow. The exhibitor is a permanent asset of the industry. The producer has to get his in thirty, sixty or ninety days.

There are a lot of fine little theatres in small cities that are the backbone of the industry closing up every day. The film producers should get together and give these little fellows service at half prices in order to keep them going, but they are all so busy trying to see that they survive and prove the other producer unfit that they won't make a move. There must be some radical change. My first suggestion would be to get rid of this idea, "the survival of the fittest," and fix it so that those who are in the business now are more fit by having conditions so that they can work and make more picture business for themselves and everybody else. We can all survive if we are all fit, and there are none of us fit until we get some of this greed and selfishness out of our systems. We should live and let live. We should survive and let others survive.

Pioneer Film Gets Territory for "Shame"

Pioneer Film Corporation, through its president, Nathan Hirsh, announces that it has secured the New York and New Jersey territorial rights to "Shame," with Zena Keefe featured. For the first time in the history of the Newark theatre, under Strand, New York, management, the house was compelled to display the "S. R. O." sign, when it opened January 13 with "Shame."

Mr. Hirsh says that he is sparing no expense in making "Shame" the success of the season. He has appropriated a large sum to an advertising campaign. Mr. Hirsh has also secured "Who Shall Take My Life" and "City of Purple Dreams," two additional seven-reel subjects.

Carlton Closes Foreign Rights Territory

Carle E. Carlton, Crest Pictures Corporation, announces that the Lillian Walker feature, "The Lust of the Ages," has been disposed of in Great Britain through the Robertson-Cole Company. He also announces that this production has been sold for France and Spain to the Money Film Company, of Paris.

Oldknow Announces Changes in Sales Force

William Oldknow has again taken up the duties in connection with the general management of the Consolidated Film and Supply Company, Atlanta, Ga. Since returning to the South, Mr. Oldknow has made a number of changes in the sales force of this company. He announces that "Smiling Jimmy" Kelly, has been made general sales manager in the Southwest with headquarters in Atlanta. Mr. Kelly still retains his position as manager of the Southern States Film Company, Atlanta.

Mr. Kelly reports that he expects one of the greatest seasons of his career. He has appointed Mrs. E. Wright, one of the best known film women in the South, to look after his interests in Atlanta, in the capacity of assistant manager of both companies. Her experience is wide.

Mr. Oldknow has appointed U. T. Koch as branch manager of his Atlanta office, Mr. Koch leaving the Paramount Company to join Mr. Oldknow's forces. He succeeds C. T. Jordan who has been appointed manager of the Consolidated office at Jacksonville, Fla., John R. Barton, former manager of that office having been called to the colors. William Sipe, former road man for the Consolidated, has been made office manager of the Memphis, Tenn., office. William Heyward, former auditor of the company, assumes the position of secretary and treasury of the company, succeeding C. R. Beacham, resigned.

Foursquare Pictures to Assist Relief Work

Foursquare Pictures, co-operating with the Great Lakes Naval Relief, is preparing to aid this patriotic cause by distributing through its twenty-one exchanges the pictures now being made showing the training of recruits. M. H. Hoffman, administrative head of this independent organization, has sent to Mrs. W. A. Moffet, chairman of the Great Lakes Naval Relief, at Great Lakes, Ill., the following letter:

"I cannot too strongly endorse the excellence, at this time, of the film entitled 'Our Boys and Your Boys,' showing the work that is being done at the Great Lakes Relief Training Station in the cause of democracy's freedom. It is my belief that the distribution of this film will not only be of the greatest interest to the public at large, but that it will appeal to and stimulate a patriotic feeling within all who see it. Foursquare Pictures will be only too glad to do its share in this splendid work by distributing, without charge, the film in question. Our twenty-one exchanges in the United States and Canada are at your service in this mattter."

Warming the Office

The Famous Players-Lasky Corporation on January 19 gave its office employees a "house warming" party in the new wing of the floor taken over recently to handle the increased activities of the company. The affair was attended by everyone from president to office boys, and was a genuine get-together gathering.

Exhibitor Service Bureau

How Far With Trademark?

Name of the Producer Often Helps Greatly. But Your Theatre Is the Main Thing

MANY exhibitors who have been carefully following this department have inquired how far they should go toward using the trademarks of the producers in their advertising and to what extent they should subordinate their theatre to do so.

Answering the last question first, let us say that you should never subordinate your theatre to anything. Your theatre is yours and it is the one thing that you want to build up. Make the name of your house a trademark for the best and make the people come to your house because it is the best and not because of a particular production.

We have recommended many, many times that you get a name plate, a design for your newspaper advertising and always use this in your displays. By always we mean ALWAYS; never let anything tempt you from putting your house before the public first. With this equipment you are better able to handle the varying conditions of motion picture productions intelligently.

Now without going into comparisons the productions of various companies fall into different groupings so far as advertising methods are concerned. For instance, in cases where companies are spending large amounts in national campaigns, it would be the height of folly not to link up with these campaigns by letting the public know that you show the pictures of that company. In case of newspaper advertising, as has been pointed out many times, you can make the whole space used by the producing or distributing company center on your house by using a much smaller space under the main display.

One other thing is to be seriously considered. The motion picture fan of today is not the outsider of a couple of years ago who could be fooled by the little tricks of the game. Today the real "fan" is probably more familiar with the history of the players, the work of the various companies and their standing than is the average theatre manager. Any sort of advertising or exploitation of any kind that you do ought to have this in mind. It is alright to tell the people again something that they already know, but be mighty careful that you don't tell them something that they will know to be untrue.

So when we say that it is preferable for you to mention the name of the maker of the picture, or its brand, or its trademark, we are anticipating your question of: "What's the use of doing that if the fan already knows that fact?" But it is not doing any harm to tell him something that he already knows. And you may attract some people who do not know of this player's connections and who have been delighted by some other attraction from the same producer.

Of course, when you get down to the rock bottom, it all depends upon whether the productions of a particular company are popular in your community. And if the productions are not popular it is up to you to get out and select some that will fill the bill.

But we do believe in connecting up, where the productions merit the coupling. We print on the opposite pages an advertisement of the Old Mill theatre, Dallas, Texas, which has used one of the advertisements prepared by Artcraft and then in the lower-left-hand corner, one of the suggestions of Goldwyn. Both of these carry credit to the producers, which is natural when these were designed in the offices of the producers and we believe that they are entitled to this credit. Certainly this does not weaken your announcement, and it will probably pull in additional patrons.

In one instance we disagree with the suggestion of Artcraft, which is a very mild instance of some of the other producers who put over the names of the director, scenario writer and even the camera man, in large letters. For exploitation purposes we do not believe that the public is interested in knowing who wrote the scenario and in very few cases who directed the picture, unless, of course, the person might be a man with local connections. And the name of the author is inessential unless it means something. Remember that the secret of good advertising is to say no more than you have to say, and stop there.

Without any attempt at selection, except to get good displays in the various classes, we have picked a number of announcements of productions. With the exception of a single column display of the Princess theatre, St. Paul, and that of the Park, Boston, none of these houses gives credit to the producing company, but in not one of these instances do we believe that it would have injured the appearance of the displays to have done so and it might have added some business.

But after all, the whole thing simmers down to one thing:

You have got to have good pictures to make your house a success; and you have got to make the name of your theatre synonymous with good pictures.

We repeat that the main thing is to make your house stand out by comparison with the others. One of the chief ways to do this is through your advertising, and we believe that many of the aids and suggestions of the producers will do you good. And you can safely bet that no producer who has your interest really at heart is going to try to make your house a secondary matter. It would be shortsighted policy to have you merely advertise the brand of picture and let the house that is paying for them take care of itself.

Especially in the smaller communities, you will find many of these advertising aids of great value. In the larger communities conditions may be different, but it still remains a fact that even in New York the name of the producer is always mentioned by Rialto, Strand and Rivoli.

Now, in the final discussion of advertising for the present, let us look at these displays for a moment. Circle theatre, Indianapolis, had used almost entirely the advertising suggestion from Goldwyn, but had not used the name of the producer, though it is only fair to say that the best of the advertising of the Circle on this production had not reached us when this plate was made. But the point is that Circle always uses big, dominating space with striking cuts. It tries to make its display dominate the page and it generally does.

Shea's Hippodrome has its own advertising prepared, and while it uses comparatively small space, the design of the advertising always makes it stand out.

Standard theatre, Cleveland, is committed to a single figure or face, the name of the star and the title, a mighty good way of advertising when you have brought your house to an unquestioned position.

Metropolitan, in the same city, uses similar designs the whole time and "Metropolitan" is the thing that it constantly drives home. It has made its policy and it is not necessary for the house to repeat encomiums. It has only to say that the production is up to its standard.

Majestic, Columbus, Ohio, follows somewhat similar advertising, Sunday after Sunday. It has the virtue of being simple, carrying the name of the star and the title in large space and bringing out the name of the house and the picture of the star in a dominating way.

And while we have consistently opposed advertising the bill for the entire week, where there are two or three changes, with equal prominence, the work of the Strand theatre, Buffalo, stands out as a good example of those that are committed to such a policy.

But the thing that we do want to bring out is that all of these work to one purpose—that they make the theatre itself dominate as it should dominate. Whether you want to include the name of the producer or not is largely a matter of whether it brings you any increased business. That is something which requires first hand

THERE is always something new for the man who is thinking, hunting up something novel. And, of course, we are talking about Rothapfel and how this is illustrated at the Rialto this week and how he is sending everyone away talking about a very simple little thing—simple, yes, but no one ever thought about getting this effect before.

It comes during the rendition of "Asleep in the Deep" by Emanuel List, after the Animated has led up to the water effect by showing the Finley pictures of salmon fishing. The singer appears in the costume of a lighthouse keeper and there is not a light in the house save the beams on his face. Gradually these die away, then come again, etc., and immediately one gets the effect of the lighthouse. Even a five-year-old child in the box with the writer GOT the effect. "What is that, darling?" the boys' mother asked him and quick as a flash he answered: "Lighthouse." It was one of those little things that we talk so much about, but it brought thunderous applause and resulted in most valuable word of mouth advertising for the Rialto. The music was accompanied by wave effects, while the flashing of the lightning in the proscenium arch and the rolls of thunder added more realism.

Both the male and female choruses of the Rialto are used this week in connection with the overture, "The Queen of Sheba." During the playing of this the whole of the house was in red and purple, emblematic of royalty and splendor. The orchestra was literally bathed with red and during the orchestral portion of the number the house was filled with the odor of incense, one of the few times that the perfume effect has been used at this theatre. Toward the end the curtains parted revealing the female chorus in the centre of the stage and the men, in Arabian garb, at either side. It was most effective and scored the same big hit that it made last week.

Rialto Animated Magazine opens this week with pictures of American troops learning to build bridges, played with 'Let's Rally" which carried through the next number, Christy Mathewson visiting a training camp. Polo playing at Corondao, Cal., was shown to a fox trot which was carried through the next number, the city-to-ocean race in San Francisco, to the point where the starting shot was fired, when a new galop was immediately introduced. Dynamiting the ice blockade was shown to a mysterioso together with the sound effects and then came the arrival of French aid for Italy with pictures of French troops marching to the front which brought thunderous applause. This was played with "Sambre et Meuse" with the horns counterpointing "Marseillaise," and continued through the new French cabinet and the Paris war council.

Now here is something worth remembering. Someone asked Mr. Rothapfel why he did not use the "Marseillaise" itself instead of the counterpoint. "Because," he replied, "it would have made the audience get up to its feet, and thereby cause more or less confusion. The counterpoint of the 'Marseillaise' was brought in at the appearance of President Poincare and got the same effect." Which is true. Never disturb your audience if you can get the effect in some other way. This counterpointing trick is worth remembering in all your music.

While this same music was being played all of the delegates to the war council got a big individual hand, but when the pictures of Pershing were shown the audience went wild with genuine enthusiasm. Pershing's field artillery at practice was shown to "Good Old U. S. A." and when an instance of the Yankee chivalry and the care of the children was shown the orchestra turned effectively to "When Yankee Doodle Learns to Polly Vous," which brought a combined laugh and applause. The Animated ended with the salmon fishing, shown to the music of swishing water and effects, and which led into "Asleep in the Deep," as we have already told you.

Then came "The Ridge Roamers," a Robert C. Bruce Educational film. It seems that one after another of these pictures stir the audiences as scenics have rarely stirred them and the intensely human note of the pictures and the clever titles get close to the audiences' heart. An idyl from "Siegfried" was used as the music for the superb scenic setting which got laugh after laugh and a big hand at the end.

This was followed by "Neapolitan Dance," a 'cello solo played by Gaston Dubois, and then came the feature, Julian Eltinge in "The Widow's Might," a comedy that pleased the audience greatly. Lively music carried the feature through.

Now while we are talking about little things worth while, watch this. The next number was the prelude to the fourth act of "Carmen," played by the orchestra. Again the orchestra was bathed in red lights, but all the rest of the house except the proscenium arch and the centre piece of the dome light, which were also red, were in white. Before the audience got a chance to applaud the splendid rendition, it was watching a picture, for with the last bars of the selection the title of the picture, "Throwing the Bull," was thrown on the screen. Everyone got the connection between the bull fighting in the opera and the picture, which was sub-titled, "A Celluloid Version of the Pike County Fair." Now this was another one of the Robert C. Bruce Educational pictures. It could hardly be called a scenic, but it was close to it. How many managers would dare put on the bill two subjects from the same source and expect to get away with it. No matter how high the quality, one might think that he had run short of sources of material. But that wasn't the case. On account of the excellence of both pictures Mr. Rothapfel wanted to use them, and he found a way by introducing the beautiful musical number and so linked up the opera selection with the picture that the effect was gripping. In other words, everyone felt that just the right thing had been done.

This might be called a bill of little things—little things marvelously well done. They are things that you can do if you think, if you are always striving to make the most of it. Don't tell us that you are too busy to devote the time to it. No one can be busier than Rothapfel with these two immense houses dependent on his personal direction and a dozen of other things. But he always makes time to do things And he never stops thinking. And you can't afford not to think, either.

A MOVING illustrated song is used by Managing Director Harold Edel at the Strand this week to get an excellent effect. This comes when Herbert Waterous sings "It's a Long Way to Berlin," and on the screen behind him are shown pictures which carry out the words of the song. The words of the chorus were thrown on the screen and the audience took them up with more or less enthusiasm.

Strand Topical Review is shorter than usual this week, but it introduces a feature that is distinctly novel. It opens with polo playing at Corondo beach and then shows pictures of Fuel Administrator Garfield. And that official got a big hand. Next were shown the construction of the many new buildings at Washington for government use, followed by official war pictures of the Americans in France. All of these were Hearst-Pathe. Then comes the big punch with the Paramount-Bray showing the growth of Germany from 1140 and the way she swallowed up her smaller neighbors and then showing her aims at present. It was a particularly striking piece of work.

Making of an American officer at Plattsburg interested the audience greatly. This is released by Educational and the patriotic music played with it, counterpointed with "Yankee Doodle" made it very effective. The American flag is twice introduced at the Strand this week, once during the Topical and the second time at the end of this picture.

There are a number of laughs in the feature, "Stella Maris" with Mary Pickford," but its tragic ending is offset by "The Superstitious Girl," one of the James Montgomery Flagg series of comedies that are going over big.

The overture is "I Pagliacci" and the other musical number Gertrude Hoffman, soprano, singing "The Song of Kisses."

How the First Scenic Picture, "Hound of the Hill," Was Featured in the Electric Sign of the New Rivoli Theatre

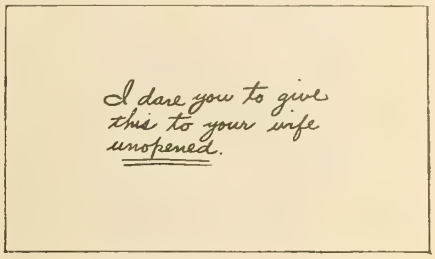
IT'S a far cry from a couple of years ago when the scenic was merely a filler, a time killer on the program of a five or ten cent theatre until today when one of these pictures is featured on the electric sign of the newest and finest motion picture house in the world.

But this is just what the past week saw happen at the Rivoli where "The Hound of the Hills," one of the Robert Bruce scenics released by Educational Film Corporation has this honor, as the cut reproduced here shows. And it is well to note that at the same time another Bruce picture "The Trail of the Sky," was being shown at the Rialto and one of the Ditmars-Educationals, "Animals in Midsummer," was getting numerous laughs at the Strand.

"Reports from all sections of the country show that the increase in high grade scenics is growing by leaps and bounds," said E. W. Hammons, general manager of Educational, in discussing the new honors that have been heaped on his product. "It was but a short time ago that the scenic was not in high favor because they consisted of a mere series of still pictures with little or nothing to connect them. It is by using a general theme and connecting the different 'shots' together and striving at some concrete purpose that we are able to give real interest to these pictures."

This has been especially true of the Robert Bruce pictures. There is always something to connect these, and the splendidly written titles aid greatly in achieving this result. In two of these pictures, "Me and My Dog," and "The Hound of the Hills," the big Dane has been the chief connecting feature. In the first picture Mr. Bruce and the dog went through the scenes showing the enjoyment of being alone with the beauties of nature and in the latter the dog, with his love for the magnificent alone appears. The animal gives the pictures a human interest that invariably brings applause. And the Bruce titles are always full of laughs, clever spontaneous humor that is appreciated by the audiences.

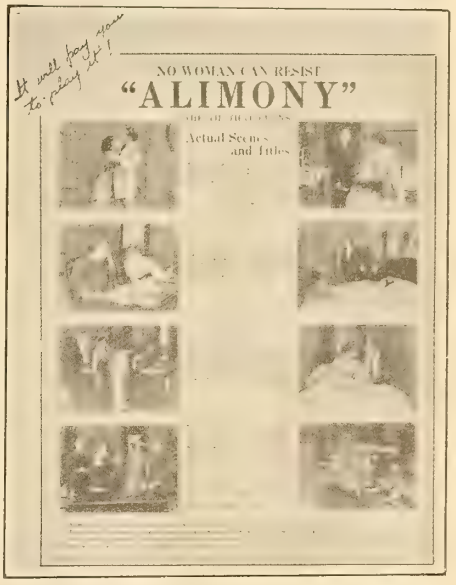
Mr. Bruce will start in a few days on another trip which will occupy ten months. He has some elaborate plans and naturally the sections that he intends to visit are not announced. However, there is to be one plan new to most scenics followed in his work in that he is to prepare scenarios for the various pictures that he is to make and work all the time with definite objects in view. This will enable him to use shots taken at widely separate points and at the same time to unite them in harmony with his general story. There will probably be fewer of the Bruce-Educationals made during the year, but of an even higher grade, if that is possible.



Humor adds a great deal to the Raymond L. Ditmars pictures of animals. The last three of these shown at the Strand have been particularly delightful and while they accomplish the purpose of being really educational in giving sidelights on the animals they portray they do this in an entertaining manner. The patron dislikes being told that he is going to be educated and have it forced upon him. But he wants to be interested and amused at the same time, and that is what the Educational Film product is seeking to accomplish.

In addition to these pictures the Education has arranged for the release of thirty of the Newman travel pictures during the coming year. These pictures have never been shown at less than a dollar admission and the exhibitor is promised an excellent opportunity with their becoming available.

Clever Stunt Suggested to Call Attention to "Alimony"



FIRST NATIONAL EXHIBITORS' SERVICE has outlined a clever little advertising stunt on "Alimony" that is bound to attract attention.

In a plain envelope which is addressed in long hand and marked "Personal" and sent to the patron there is enclosed another envelope which is inscribed, in an imitation of handwriting "I dare you to give this to your wife UNOPENED."

That is almost too much for human curiosity and the recipient is sure to pry loose the seal on the spot and discover that he has an announcement which bears the title "No woman can resist 'Alimony'" and then includes eight scenes from the production.

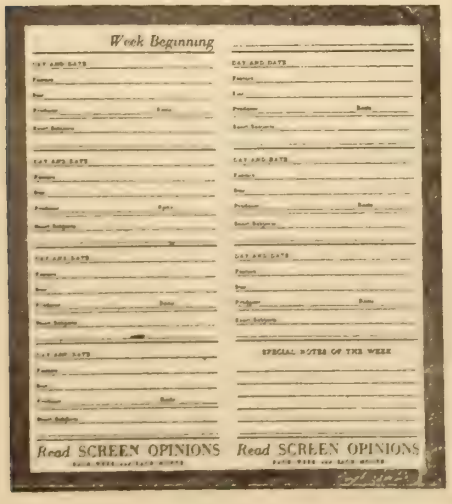
Cleveland House Gets Potatoes for Poor

The Alhambra theatre, Euclid avenue and East 105th street, Cleveland, Ohio, was the means of making many poor families in the city happy on New Year's Day. It has been the custom of the Alhambra, for the past few years, to conduct a matinee, just before the beginning of the new year, to which the only admission it not less than three potatoes and as many more as people feel like bringing. This year there were six barrels placed in the lobby of the theatre, and all six barrels were full at the close of the matinee. They were distributed by the Associated Charities.

Your Idea---and Ours

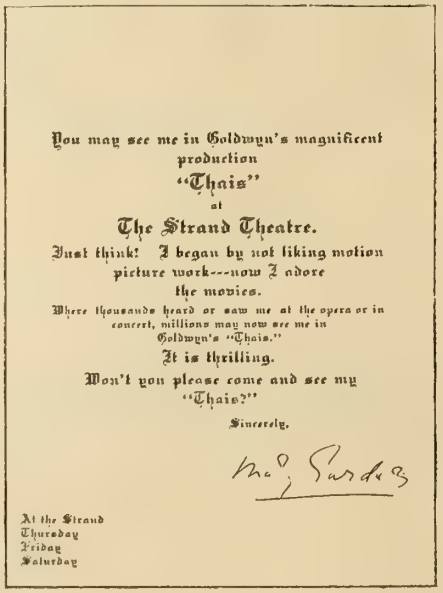
GORDON'S Olympia theatre, Boston, has achieved simplicity and striking effect in the displays before the theatre, on which we have commented before. Here is the display that was made on the first Petrova-made picture "A Daughter of Destiny."



By using only the picture of the star and few words in large letters, with the whole display stretched across the front of the lobby over the heads of the patrons a smashing effect was obtained. The crowds seen entering the house show the result of this sort of work.

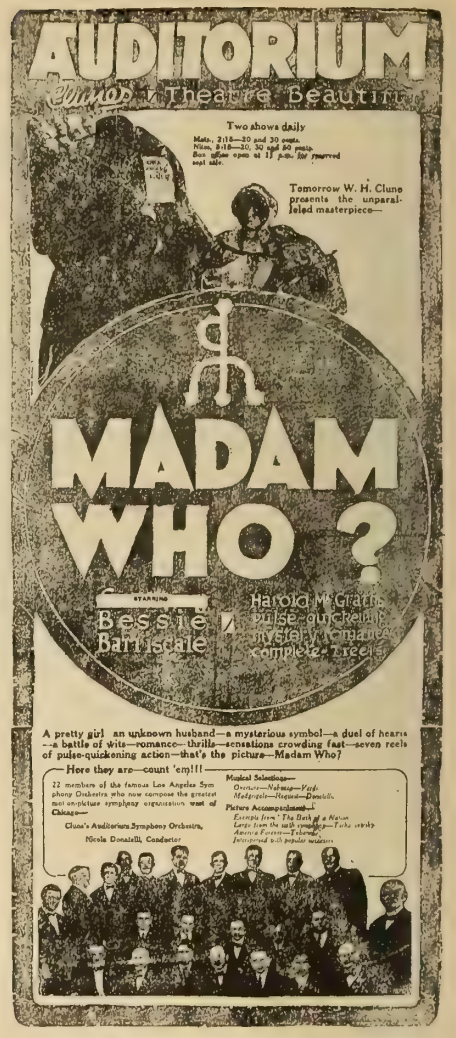
Teaser advertising in the newspapers was employed in advance of the production and there was large space employed in the Sunday papers just before the opening of the week's run.

Let the "sob stuff" in your house be confined to that shown on the screen; there's no place for it elsewhere.



CAHILL-IGOE COMPANY, Chicago, has issued an attractive booking book which it is distributing free to all exhibitors who ask for it. This book has the advantage of extreme simplicity and there are no involved processes to be followed. It contains space for the name of the feature, the star, the producer and the number of reels. Beneath this are two lines for the short subjects.

This booklet ought to save the exhibitors a lot of confusion, especially where they are using a number of different services on the features and getting the short subjects from different exchanges. It is mighty easy to mislay the letters giving your booking, especially when they are coming in from many different sources, but by using this system you have an adequate and convenient record.



A steady diet of meat without any sauce would be rather tiresome. That's the reason its worth while adding garnishments to your photoplay presentations.

GOLDWYN has suggested to exhibitors the form of a letter with the reproduction of a signature cut of Mary Garden to be used in advance of the presentation of "Thais." It was suggested that this be sent out in imitation typewritten form type which is available at almost every newspaper office.

You may see me in Goldwyn's magnificent production

The Strand Theatre.
Just think! I began by not liking motion picture work---now I adore the movies.
Where thousands heard or saw me at the opera or in concert, millions may now see me in Goldwyn's "Thais."
It is thrilling.
Won't you please come and see my "Thais?"
Sincerely,
Mary Garden

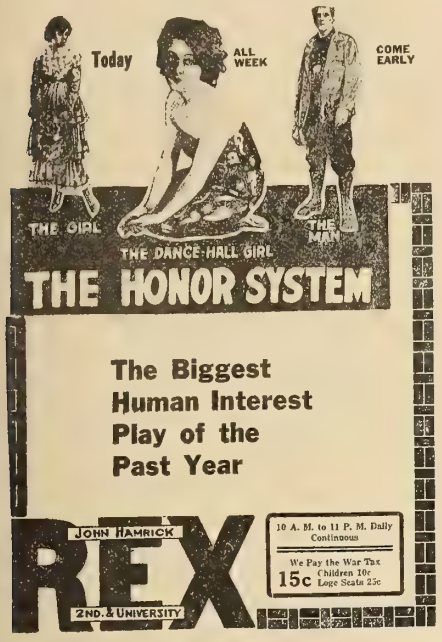
But W. J. Hayes manager of the Strand theatre, Erie, Pa., went a step further and had the announcement engraved, and the signature reproduced. The finest quality of paper and envelopes was used and the whole result was an artistic achievement.

We are not in sympathy with the suggestions of producers to send out letters on every production. In the first place the expense would be too large and a constant receipt of such letters would tire the average patron. But it is a splendid thing to do now, and then, especially when you have some special attraction that will back it up.

CLUNE'S Auditorium, Los Angeles, presents an ideal use of "Ben Day" work in one of its displays on Bessie Barriscale in "Madam Who?" Of course it is necessary to have the service of an engraver to accomplish this effect though something similar may be done by using the same character of ready-made ads that are furnished by a few of the film companies. Other papers carry the same display in black and white.

Only one thing about this display that we do not like—the expression "Unparalleled masterpiece." In the vernacular "there ain't no such animal." The argument of this advertisement would have been very much stronger had this been omitted and one is tempted to believe that this was put in simply because the writer found some white space that he thought he ought to fill.



Introduction of a picture of the orchestra at the bottom of the display does not interfere with the photoplay but adds a sales argument to the patron.

WE have commented many, many times, how much more powerful is the use of cuts rather than a large amount of descriptive matter, and this is certainly well demonstrated in the display of the Rex theatre, Seattle, Wash.

Manager John Hamrick has employed three figures, The Girl, The Dance Hall

What Live Wires Are Doing

Girl and The Man, and has left the patrons to draw their own conclusions. He has added a few lines that this is "the biggest human interest play of the year" and then he leaves the people to come to his theatre to see if the story is that which is suggested to them by the pictures.

Run your theatre as a theatre—not as a branch drug store or candy shop.

MANAGER J. H. CLAUSER, of the Dreamland theatre, Galena, Ill. (a town of about 5,000 people), has shown that the small city manager can think and originate to his profit. Recently he issued a twenty page booklet entitled "Twelve Master Photoplays." These included the four-page cover and then twelve pages, each of which was devoted to one of the pictures and, in most cases, carrying a cut of the star. These productions were divided between Paramount, Metro and Vitagraph. More than that the reading matter is cleverly written and while there is no attempt made to tell the full story of the pictures, there is enough said to arouse the interest.

Now a daring feature of this booklet is that the manager was willing to spend a considerable amount for announcements covering two weeks and left all the ballyhoo out of it. But it is the sort of a booklet that is bound to be impressive. It is the sort of constructive work that builds business for the theatre.

Don't keep telling your public that your theatre is the best; make everyone know that it is.

MISSION theatre, Portland, Ore., furnishes an example of the silhouette in advertising that is worthy of notice. The attraction at the time was "Bucking Broadway," a title which probably is a better advertising title outside of New York than in the city itself, but it certainly carries with it the atmosphere of both the East and the West, especially when it is considered that Harry Carey, who is generally associated with Western pictures, is the star.

But the main thing to point out is that this work of the Mission stands out among its other well advertised neighbors because the ad writer did the unusual in this case. He saw a chance to use the silhouette effect with a punch and he did it. You need not be told that this advertisement is the work of a man who thinks.

HERE is an out of the ordinary display. We spoke some time ago of using too many cuts in advertising, but here is a case where it is justified for every picture used means something and carries out a separate idea which merges with the main one.

We don't advise advertising like this specimen of the Kinema, Oakland, Cal., but in this particular case it did attract attention, because it repeated pictures of women and emphasized the sex element without using any long list of adjectives. It is the sort of a display that is calculated to arouse the curiosity of the reader. The Kinema had an unusual opportunity in "The Auction Block" to do this without making any statements that are not borne out by the picture, but it would not be safe for the advertiser to try the same thing without knowing that the picture did bear out the statements that he was making.

This we class under "freak" advertising. It's good once in a while to break the monotony, but the great trouble with this sort of a thing is that the advertiser commences straining for the freak idea and then he generally oversteps himself and gets into hot water.

Increasing My Theatre's Appeal

This is the third of our series of articles, "The Diary of a Successful Exhibitor," by a successful exhibitor who will tell week after week what he has done to develop his house, the lessons that he has learned and the errors that he has discovered. It is a frank discussion of the pleasures and evils of exhibition in a town of 15,000, and the tips contained here will probably be of value to managers in all sections.

By a Successful Exhibitor

MY opening was a grand success and my newspaper friend gave me splendid treatment. More space was devoted to the details of the presentation than had ever been given anything in the amusement line in my town before. Yet on the second day business was poor, although it was the first chance that the general public had to buy tickets. I couldn't understand it at first, but after I had begun a careful study I found that it was due to reaction. The conditions were the same as prevailed the day after the visit of a circus. Everyone had gone out and had a big time that day, but the next day they had to give over to getting back on the job.

I quickly realized that the thing that I had to do was to make the people realize that I had a good bill, well presented at my theatre every day and that it was bad business to pick out any one special day and center all my efforts on that single day. I was after that to learn better and better that one who is regularly running a motion picture house cannot afford to pick out a single day as an "occasion," but must devote just as much attention to every other day.

But although business was bad the first day that my box office was open and I failed to take in enough to pay the expenses for the two days, I had accomplished the thing that I had set out to accomplish—I had everyone in my whole section talking about my theatre. And I had accomplished another thing. Every one of my invitations to the opening bore the name of the person to whom they were sent and I had had my ticket taker, a young man who knew everyone in the section, note the name of the person who accompanied the recipient. In that way I secured a complete list of all who had actually attended. On the following day a letter went out to all of these about the first change in the bill at my theatre. The results were amazingly successful, with the exception of a few cases where the recipients thought that they were getting a second free trip. But I had made up my mind from the start that no one should have anything on me in courtesy and after I had explained to these people that they might expect to get similar letters from time to time calling attention to special attractions, I invited them to be my guests the second time. Some of these people had come from a distance and others were women and children who might not have had the admission price with them, and, at any rate, I did not want to leave any cause for their embarrassment.

But the main point is that I did a splendid business the first day of the second picture and almost as good on the second day of the run. Having opened on Tuesday and running the same picture again on Wednesday, and then having had Thursday and Friday for the second picture, I could give the third change of bill only one day, Saturday, so as to bring my arrangement back to the original plan of new bills on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays. But the Saturday business was again disappointing. At the same time it was a mighty good thing for me, because it taught me something.

I had been led to expect that I would have big receipts on Saturdays on account of the number of people who came from the country to do their buying on Saturdays, but on this particular day they didn't seem to do this. That evening I enquired the reason from several of the merchants, and they admitted that they had not done the usual Saturday business. "But," pointed out one of these merchants, "you will find out that you cannot get any volume of the people to come to town oftener than once a week unless as a matter of necessity. We did our biggest day's business on record on your opening day, Tuesday, and the result is that these same people spent Saturday at home."

That meant a great deal to me after I had spent Sunday thinking it over. It was this: When some amusement attraction brought the people to town they spent more money with the local stores. It was certainly to the advantage of the local merchants for me to be able to get the people to come to my theatre, for they would find time on the same trip to buy goods. And therefore they ought to co-operate with me. And, still further, if that co-operation brought results, mutual co-operation all the way around would get even better results. I spent that whole Sunday figuring out the plan and before I had gone to sleep I had evolved a definite scheme.

This was nothing more or less than to have a "bargain day" every Saturday. I drew up in rough the design for a little folder in which each of the merchants would have space for their announcements, with my theatre dominating. In fact, the introduction to the circular was based on my show for the week, and by preparing suggestions for the advertising of the merchants I could get them to make references to my attractions. One of these folders was included in every purchase. Further than that I persuaded these men to put posters of my Saturday attractions in their stores. A few were hesitant at first for fear that they would lose the friendship of the proprietors of the other houses, but they were soon won over.

It was some three weeks after this that I discovered another tonic for these country customers, and that was in the shape of a serial. After spending a half hour around the postoffice I was impressed by the fact that many of these people on getting the weekly city paper to which they subscribed turned to the serial story before they read any other part of the paper. This was especially true of the women and the younger folk of both sexes. Since the opening of the house I had been running a serial Mondays and Tuesdays, but I thought so highly of this idea that I bought a second serial and arranged for its showing on Saturdays only. I did not make any special attempt to advertise this to the country people, but rather put the emphasis on the feature picture. I counted on the strength of the story to bring them back again next Saturday, and I did not count in vain.

In the course of five Saturdays under this new "bargain day" plan my matinees were exceeding the business that I did on any of the evenings. The merchants told me that their trade had also increased beyond their expectations and that a number of people who had heretofore traded in another town were coming to them. I don't want to jump too far ahead of this story, but let me say that this plan was more than satisfactory. It brought new business—additional business to the patronage of the town itself, and it left me an opening to also bring new business on other days of the week.

YOU CAN LEARN

Lots of Little Things Told by Successful Exhibitor

FROM what we have seen of these articles by a Successful Exhibitor there are lots of his suggestions that can be applied to almost every house in the country.

Here is a man who invested all of his own savings and part of his aged father's money in a motion picture house. He knew that he was not trained in this business, but he had to make good.

How he met the new problems and how he developed new business make interesting reading. He made some mistakes, but he was quick to see his own, but the main thing was that he kept his wide-awake mind always on the possibilities of his theatre.

Many of you doubtless have had similar experiences. We would like to hear how you met your serious problems and how you worked out methods to stimulate your business. Others need your ideas; don't hide them.

Rothapfel's Answers to Exhibitors

Mr. Rothapfel Will Answer Here any Questions Regarding Problems in Exhibition. The Only Conditions Are That the Questions Must Not Bear on the Merits of Particular Pictures or Services and That They Must Come Through the NEWS. Address Your Inquiries "ROTHAPFEL ADVICE, EXHIBITORS' SERVICE BUREAU, MOTION PICTURE NEWS."

XXI—Here is a question that is disturbing me seriously. In our town the electric current is shut off at 10.30 p.m. There is no way to get it for a longer time, except on Saturday nights, when the time limit is midnight. I have preferred to pay a reasonable amount to have the light continued for half an hour, and have even gotten up a petition, but without result. My town has become accustomed to long shows. I have to run a feature of at least five reels, a comedy and on two nights of the week a serial. I can see no way in the world that I can get the people in for two shows during the evening, for the reason that the greater share of my patrons are laboring people who do not leave the factories until 5.30 and who cannot possibly get to the theatre before seven. If I could cut my show to an hour and a half I could put over two shows, but as soon as I start to shorten my performance the people immediately conclude that I am trying to save money, and the result is a loss of business. My matinee appeal is largely to women and children and is small. If I could improve that, double it, I might be all right, but at present with counting on only one show in the evening I am not paying expenses. I am willing to give a better show and give only one performance in the evening, provided I can get more money in the afternoon. What would you suggest to get a bigger attendance all the way around. I use three of the best services, change daily and have the opposition of three smaller houses, one vaudeville house that now and then plays a road attraction, and have a population of 20,000 to draw from.—JERSEYMAN.

I SUGGEST that you get together with some influential men and try to have the light extended every night. If this cannot be done, put the matter up to the public, and fight for it. Incidentally a big fight with you leading will help business. Explain the situation to the public. Take them into your confidence.

If your better judgment counsels a change, go ahead and change in spite of the few kickers. If we insisted on considering the howlers before we ever made a change, we'd still be living in caves and eating raw fish with our fingers. That isn't the way to do things. Strike out ahead. Remember good shows are not necessarily long shows. Quantity is one thing. Quality is another, and far more important thing. To get people, you have to give good shows. And let the people know you are giving good shows. Get people into your theatre in the afternoon, even if you have to give them passes. Then they will become aware of the worthiness of your entertainment, and get the habit of visiting your theatre.

Here we give two-hour shows only, at night, and I believe that you could squeeze in two perfectly satisfactory entertainments from seven to ten thirty. It is up to you as a showman.

XXII—I am employed as a mechanic during the day and run a motion picture house in the evening. I have the assistance of my wife, who attends to most of the details and acts as cashier in the show hours. I am making $6 a day in my trade, which is more than the picture show is netting me, and although I know that the house should have my personal attention, I have a family and cannot afford to take the risk. Now I have a sixteen-year-old daughter who is quite a good amateur musician and I believe that she has considerable talent. She has been very anxious to play the piano in my theatre, where the music is now furnished mechanically and has suggested that she be allowed to interest some of her girl friends and get up a quartet or something of the sort. It will require investment of several hundred dollars and will cause my daughter to work at nights—though she insists that it would be no work at all. My wife is opposed to it and thinks that I should give up the picture business entirely, although I feel sure that there is good money ahead. Wages are constantly increasing and I have the only theatre here. I know that if I quit someone else will come in, but at the same time I am making only a few dollars a day clear. I have ample ground room to increase the seating capacity at small cost if I can increase my business.—A. A. R.

YOUR letter brings me back a number of years. You had better let your girl run your theatre for you for she seems to have better ideas than her dad. Give her every chance to make good.

Try to instill a little enthusiasm into your wife. If she feels you ought to give up your theatre, she certainly is not with you heart and soul. If you pay more attention to your theatre, and less to other things, $6 will look mighty small to you in a short time. Increase your seating capacity. But my big tip to you is this: Listen to Daughter.

XXIII—My "orchestra" consists of a piano, violin and cornet. I believe that this trio supplies some of the best freak music for the slapstick comedies which are favorites at my house that can be supplied by any three musicians. I work these people from two in the afternoon with the exception of an hour for dinner when I have an extra piano player until ten in the evening and it is rather too much to ask them to spend much time rehearsing. I always show a comedy in addition to the feature and then either a scenic or a serial. I have been very much interested in reading about the way that the music at your houses had aided in making the scenics such great successes. I never am able to see these before they are shown and the result is that the three musicians simply play improvised music with these. I am especially interested in hearing that you used the "Pomp and Circumstance" march when you showed one of these. I am familiar with this selection and saw at once how it fitted in. Could you suggest a more or less general plan to follow in selecting the music for these scenics. I believe that they are going to be the backbone of the exhibition game.—L. L.

YOU say your orchestra consists of piano, violin and cornet and that this orchestra supplies some of the best freak music in captivity. Very nice. But freak music is not always interpretive music. A cornet with a violin and a piano is rather ineffective for interpretive music, but a violin and piano are excellent. Any artistically inclined person will find it a simple matter to select music for scenics. The selection should depend on the character, locale, and general atmosphere of the picture. For instance, suitable music for a Venetian water scene would be the Barcarol from the Tales of Hoffman, or Nevin's Venetian Suite. For a carnival scene, the Carnival of Venice; for Japanese scenes selections from the Mikado. Use your head.

XXIV—I don't know whether you would be willing to advise me on a question of mere prices. I have the best theatre in my town and I know that I am showing the best pictures. Recently I remodelled my house and contracted for more expensive features than I had been showing. I also employed four local musicians. They are no wonders, I know, but it is a whole lot better than the tin pan piano music that the other house is giving. When I did this I raised my evening prices to fifteen cents and then found that I was making no more than before. When the war tax came along my competitor, who had raised with me, made great capital out of the fact that he "paid the war tax." I added this to the admission price and although I tried to point out to everyone that this was a patriotic tax on the patron my competitor got the benefit of the argument. I feel that I made a mistake, but I then lowered my price to ten cents and kept the tax on the patron. My competitor promptly did the same thing, but is charging no tax. His service is a whole lot cheaper than mine and he can probably afford to do it. Business is still better than it was at fifteen cents, but I am not breaking even. I have got to put the price back again. I really cannot afford any additional expense. Can you suggest any way that I can get away with it.—KANSAN.

I AM sorry you did not have courage enough to stick to your change. It would have paid you in the end to have lost a little more money at the time and to have stuck to your guns, once you had them loaded with really effective ammunition. The way to kill opposition is to make your show bigger, better, greater. Then in a short time you will see your competitor walking around in a barrel, and if you are charitably inclined you will offer him a free pass to your theatre.

I think the trouble with you is that you are paying more attention to your competitor's business than you are to your own. Put every ounce of your energy, ability and thought into your own affairs. You evidently are producing a better all-round show than he is, with better pictures, better music, better service. Keep it up. If your competitor's stuff is cheaper than yours, it is undoubtedly not as good, and that will tell in the end. But put some life into your show. Make people talk about it. It will pay you to get someone who knows how to produce a show to help you instill some pep into your entertainment. WAKE IT UP. Put the kick, the push, the punch into it. Make a noise. Have an opening march. Get lots of comedy. Treat your patrons as if they were your brothers and sisters. You're all one big family anyway. Cheer 'em up. Make 'em laugh. It's all a question of showmanship. Go to it!

How Far to go With the Trademark Make your House the Big Thing

investigation of your own particular case, and not mere theories.

An idealist can tell you what he would do IF he were in your place. But he is not there, and you ARE THERE and you have GOT TO STAY there and a big share of it is up to you. We can tell you here, how to accomplish certain results, and can show you where you have failed or wasted. But to a considerable extent you must work for your own salvation.

Yet there is one thing that you know you must do—make your house the one dominant theatre in your section. There isn't a producer in the world who knows anything about the industry who is going to advise you to reach for any other result. Yet now and then there comes into the field someone who is shortsighted enough to allow you to use statements that are not justified, illustrations that exaggerate in [illegible]

You will have to guard against this. It doesn't take a smart man to fool a person once, but don't let him put it over a second time.

There are two things that you want to arrive at in your displays:

The first is to attract attention to your advertisement—to make every possible reader read it.

The second is to make what you say in your space so attractive and so appealing that the reader will at once immediately want to come to your theatre to see that picture.

We believe that we have gone into the field very thoroughly in this series of discussions. We have tried to take up in these preliminary articles, the good and bad in advertising from the various angles. We have discussed the use of cuts, the proper manner in which to play up stars, the way to get the big punch out of the story, and a dozen other things to do or avoid.

Yet, after you have mastered all of these details the whole thing comes down to the point, whether you have the goods. You may have the very best, and without the proper exploitation you will fail to reap the benefits. And with the bad, you may for a time be able to get away with it by exaggeration, but not for long.

We believe in using the trademarks of the producers where the pictures are good pictures and where they mean something. But it is folly to attempt to bring people to your theatre to see a bad picture, on the strength of the maker's name, just as it will as surely wreck your theatre if you try to put over a bad one on the reputation of your house.

Advertising has its wonderful uses; advertising is indispensable to the motion picture house. But you must have the goods.

Pearson, formerly with the George Kleine system and now manager of the joint Universal and First National Exchanges in Minneapolis announces that his exchange intends to give the exhibitors exemplary service. He is just installing stocks of all sorts so that he will be able to fill every need of those showing the pictures he distributes.

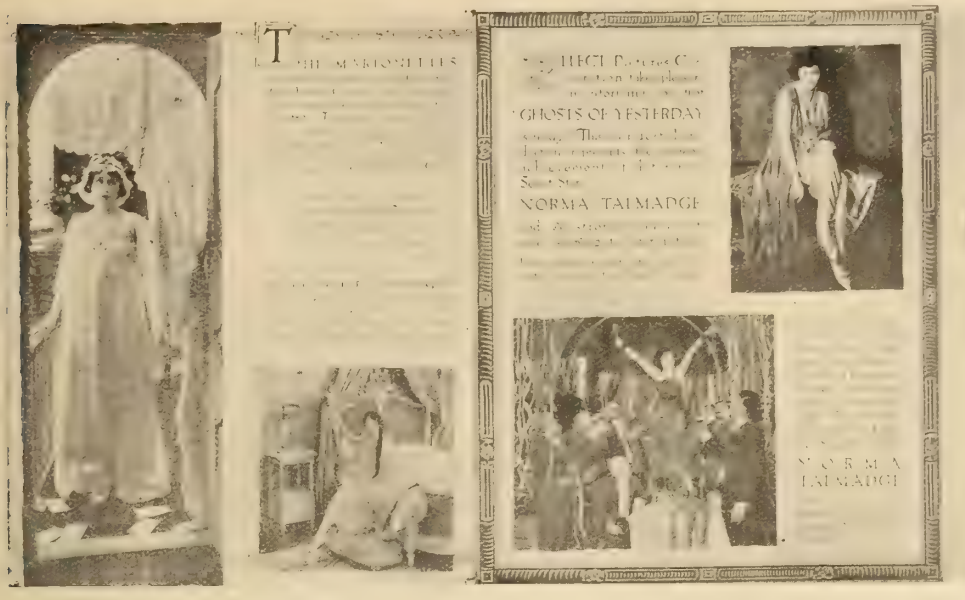
Black Drops Aid in Solving Electric Sign Display in Grand Rapids

HERE is one suggestion that is offered by the Strand theatre, Grand Rapids, Mich., as a possible way to meet the loss of advertising resulting from the "lightless nights." The fuel administrator of Michigan is rigidly enforcing the order so that all of the theatres are without means of exterior illumination.

So Strand theatre wanted to make the best out of a bad state of affairs and so the management found a very original way with which to partly overcome the handicap. By hanging a large black curtain from the marquee in front of the theatre with the name printed on it in large white letters, the contrast made the words visible for a considerable distance. The black curtain was also brought up behind the announcement of the current attraction so as to make this prominent.

Of course this does not take the place of electric lights, but it shows that the Strand is trying to make the very best out of conditions as they are.



How I Increased My Theatre's Appeal

the section and I made it a point to go to the country clerk where the owners had to register and get a list of all of the owners and then to check against these numbers those whose owners visited my theatre. I made up my mind that I could get patrons out of all of these families and that I could get a considerable business on other days than Saturdays. With this in view I prepared a special letter which was actually typewritten and signed by me to each one of these, and where I could I included some phrase that made the recipient feel that I was considering his individual case. Where I found these people becoming interested to any considerable extent I included their names on my regular mailing list, some features of which I will discuss later.

It may appear to the average reader that I seemed to be giving more attention to the out-of-town patron than to my people right at home, but that is not true. However, it is true that I was quick to realize one phychological benefit from this patronage. The "talk" of a small city is an important asset and nothing causes more comment than the fact that an unusually large number of people are in town, and especially where the visitors know a large number of people in the town, and the impression prevails that they came to see my motion picture offering. After I had time to analyze this still further, I was able to see direct instances where the presence of these people brought to my theatre people of the town itself who had never been motion picture patrons.

I was working all the time on the theory of making my theatre "the thing." There were lots of other ways in which to work on the town people.

Three examples of the folders sent out by Select Pictures to contract exhibitors to get dates for showing. They are excellent aids for the exhibitors in planning their newspaper and program displays.

Perfume System Bathes Rivoli With Roses During New Picture and Song

RIVOLI THEATRE, with its third bill, is showing some of the reasons for its construction and as the various effects are completed the wonders of the new house become the more apparent. One thing that stands out in the third presentation is the utilization of the choral effects for the presentation of classic and old-time music. There promises, especially, to be a renewal of interest in the old songs through the methods that Mr. Rothapfel has adopted in their presentation.

This week a special feature is introduced with Miss Gladys Rice singing "The Last Rose of Summer," the old English folk song which was introduced by Flotow into his opera "Martha." Miss Rice appeared in costume amid a setting of roses with the lighting at first red, emblematic of summer, and then fading into the deep blue as the autumn came. The improved lighting effects of the Rivoli were revealed in this number, the illumination coming from all angles and making the result a real bath of light.

For the first time with the ending of the Animated Pictorial and with this song the perfume system of the Rivoli was employed to perfect effect, the odor of roses permeating all portions of the house. It is the intention of Mr. Rothapfel to use this feature wherever it can be done without monotony and it will probably be used at least once at each performance. The possibilities of this innovation are almost limitless.

After the overture from "Raymond, or the Queen's Secret" was played with the main lighting system showing red fading into a purple border, "The Hound of the Hills," a remarkable Bruce-Educational scenic was shown with the accompaniment of "The Indian Lament and Ganne's Extace." This scenic is noteworthy because the only character that appears in it is the Great Dane dog, familiar to patrons from "Me and My Dog." Its theme is that of a dog who is tired of civilization and who goes out into Nature's big places. The picture got an immense hand.

This was followed by "At the Fountain," a dance interlude by pupils of Helen Moller, introducing a novel and artistic solo by a girl who stood in the center of the fountain and executed her dance while other girls worshipped in homage. Again the splendid lighting system of the Rivoli came into its own. The panels at the sides were illuminated with blue, fading into red at the edges while the dome had the same effect. The blue effect covered the orchestra while the red lights illuminated the figure of the dancer as she stood on the fountain of green light. Spot lights from the side further heightened the effect.

Rivoli Animated opened with pictures of Arabian troops fighting for the Allies, which was introduced with six bars of Chopin's "Triumphe" and then followed with Ganne's "March Arabe." The first time that we have ever seen a scientific picture get a really big hand came with the X-ray pictures of parts of the human body in action. These are shown with "Shadowland" intermezzo. Get it? Jap brides arriving at San Francisco called for the opening bars from "Mikado," and coasting and skiing pictures were thrown on the screen while "Petersburg Sleigh Ride" was played. These were followed by interesting pictures of skating at the Biltmore with "Nights of Gladness." Breaking in army mules and baby auto races were both shown to "Giddy'ap," and then followed the hotel fire at Redding, Cal., with new fire music and effects and horse races at New Orleans with "The Whip." Now note the closing number was the annual Pasadena rose carnival shown to "Bacchus March." Then the auditorium was gradually filled with the essence of roses which remained through the vocal number that followed.

Another beautiful effect was achieved with Wagner's "Spinning Chorus," sung by the twelve girls of the Rivoli female chorus, sitting at spinning wheel and distaff.

Wallace Reid in "Rimrock Jones" is the feature for this week, and the comedy element is supplied by Mr. and Mrs. Drew in "Why Henry Left Home," an unusually funny comedy.

Select Pictures Employs Novel Methods to Get Dates of Clients

SOMETHING new is being done by Select Pictures Corporation in the way of getting closer to the exhibitor. In many cases the exhibitor is sold and then left practically alone; in some cases he is really "sold."

This plan of Select is novel in that it is used only for the purpose of getting from the exhibitor the dates on which he wants to show the picture. Handsome folders bearing pictures of the star and scenes from the production are sent out on each picture, but only to the contract exhibitors —people who have bought the picture, but who have not selected the date. They are the work of Vivian Moses, publicity director.

Receipt of one of these is bound to arouse anew the interest of the exhibitor in the particular picture and start him to thinking of the best ways to handle it. There is just enough reading matter to give the showman a few lines for use in his advertising. The illustrations are made in sufficiently fine screen so that cuts may be made from them for use in your newspaper and program advertising. This is valuable matter to have before you, if you will start to plan your exploitation as soon as you select the date. Then file these away for the proper time.

You can use lots of schemes to get the people to your theatre once, but it's going to take merit in your presentation to bring them back again.

Ready Made Ad-Talks

Arnold Daly in "My Own United States"; Anthony P. Kelly, Author

(Frohman Amusement Eight Reel Production)

Patrons of the ———— theatre will have the opportunity of seeing the greatest patriotic drama ever produced when the Frohman Amusement Corporation's special feature, "My Own United States," is shown on ———— of ———— week. Written by Anthony P. Kelly, probably the greatest original writer for the screen, and starring the celebrated actor Arnold Daly, this picture is one of the most perfect in every detail that the management of the ———— theatre has ever offered. It combines the historical story of Alexander Hamilton and Aaron Burr, those two statesmen of the early days of the American Republic, who fought so long and bitterly, with the epic piece of fiction "The Man Without a Country," by Edward Everett Hale. You are all acquainted with these two stories, each of them the most dramatic in history and fiction respectively and seeing them brought into being on the screen will be of more than the usual interest. The production is complete in every detail, from costumes, settings, even down to locations for the duel of Hamilton and Burr was staged in Weehawken, N. J., just across the river from New York City, on a spot very near where the original duel was fought over a century ago. Mr. Daly, in his characterization of Philip Nolan, the Man Without a Country, rises to dramatic heights seldom seen on either screen or stage, while his support is of an order unusually high. Duncan McRae as Alexander Hamilton gives perhaps the second best performance, although the entire cast is so good that to single any set of players out and rate them above the rest is wellnigh impossible. Don't forget! America's greatest patriotic drama on ———— of ———— week.

He establishes her in a surburban home, and the two are happy until Franklyn meets some of his old friends and forgets about his little wife. Cherry Blossom becomes lonesome for the Japanese tea garden at home. Kato whom she had left behind has a vision in which he sees the girl he loves in distress. He tells her father that he should go to America and visit his daughter. The two leave for America, and the father after investigation learns that his daughter's American husband is neglecting her. Fannie Ward in "Innocent"—Adapted From George Broadhurst's Stage Success

(Pathe Five Reel Production)

Do you remember Fannie Ward in "The Cheat?" If you do you will remember that the star and the production was pronounced the hit of the season. Miss Ward, as her first work for Pathe, presents the title-role in the screen version of George Broadhurst's stage success, "Innocent." "Innocent" is the same type of drama as was "The Cheat," and it is presented with the same degree of finesse. "Innocent" is one of the banner five-reel production of the season, and will rank as one of the best in the history of the screen drama. In the supporting cast with Miss Ward are seen John Miltern, who originated the role of John Wyndham in the stage production; Armand Kalitz and Frederick Perry.

WHY WORTH WHILE

These Ad Talks Give You Insight Into the Picture

IT is too true that the publicity prepared by some of the producing companies is intended merely to sell the picture to you—the exhibitor—and that little account of the public is taken into consideration. In some cases the advance matter is devoted to something that the producer wants to impress on the exhibitor.

These Ad Talks, no matter what the brand of the picture may be, are aimed at the chief purpose of telling you what to tell the public about the picture. They boil down the gist of the story, give you the big striking facts. And at the same time they are informative to you, and you can better exploit any production when you are thoroughly familiar with the character of it.

We urge you to either clip these and file them away, or better still, keep the copies of the NEWS intact and use a memo., one alphabetically arranged, for an index of the pictures, together with the page and issue in which they are to be found.

It'll save you a lot of worry.

The story opens in China, where we find Innocent living with her father, who has fallen a victim to drink. She has never know life excepting in the little tea garden of China. Her father dies, and she is entrusted to the care of John Wyndham, friend of her father. John longs to be back in Paris and the gay life. He leaves for Paris accompanied by Innocent. He has always had a strong desire for gambling, and once in Paris his old habits assert themselves, and he becomes a frequenter of the gambling resorts, particularly that of Louis Doucet. He is absent from home at nights, and leaves Innocent alone in the beautiful home he has provided for her. Doucet meets her and pays frequent visits to her home. John comes home one night and finds him with Innocent, and realizes the danger confronting the innocent girl. He realizes that he loves her, and asks her to marry him. She laughs and calls him foolish. He is hurt. He takes her to the country estate and Doucet follows. The two elope to Paris. John follows and kills Doucet when he attacks Innocent because she insists upon marriage before spending the honeymoon. He goes back to China and Innocent follows, realizing that John is a true friend.

In the supporting cast are Wadsworth Harris, George Gebhart, Jean Hersholt and Claire Du Brey. Jack Mulhall presents the role of Robert Wesley, son of Admiral Wesley. He has just completed his last term at Annapolis, is waiting to hear if he has passed his final examinations. His father receives a telegram notifying him that his son has flunked. Robert feels the humiliation, and goes to his father's study to reflect. While there the butler enters, and by the aid of a skeleton key takes some valuable naval plans from the Admiral's desk. Robert's suspicions are aroused, and he remains concealed from the butler's view. A stranger enters, and Robert hears him tell the butler that a certain baroness is expected to arrive from Germany, and gives him the password by which she is to be received. Robert decides upon a plan which, if successful, will establish himself in the good graces of his father. He goes to the place where the ship is to dock, meets the baroness, who is a spy, imprisons her, and attired in her clothing, meets the band of German spies, and makes it possible for the authorities to arrest them. "The Menace," with Corinne Griffith, Evart Overton—Mystery Society Drama

"The Menace" features Corinne Griffith and Evart Overton. This Vitagraph production is one of the best, and presents an intensely interesting story in a way that will afford entertainment for all—old and young. Dr. Burnell is worried lest the real identity of the boy should become known. A few weeks before the marriage is set, Morgan is freed from prison, and learns that his baby had been adopted by the Burnells. He plans to make use of the connection. He visits the Burnells and tells Richard that he is not the son of Burnell, but that he, Morgan, is his father. He then threatens him with exposure unless he assist him in rifling the safes of the neighborhoods. At several receptions which are given in honor of the wedding, their are burglaries committed. Richard has assisted Morgan in obtaining entrance to the various homes. Suspicion falls on him. Finally he frames Morgan, and has him arrested. It develops that Morgan is not his father, and that he is the legitimate son of the Burnells.

The husband leaves on a yachting trip, and soon after the yacht on which he sailed is reported sunk. The wife believing that her husband had been lost renews her acquaintance of the man whom she had always loved. Later her husband turns up, and finds his wife in the arms of her lover. He pretends a deep interest in his wife's lover. Laurel discovers a serum for the cure of anthrax. Leslie begs her to innoculate him with the serum as an experiment. The husband overhears the conversation, and determines that the time has come for him to act. He destroys the serum, and in doing so innoculates himself by contact with the test tube. The husband dies, and Laurel and Leslie are united.

Texas Guinan in "The Gun Woman," Story of the West—Adventure

(Triangle Five Reel Production)

"The Gun Woman" is a typical Western drama, with Texas Guinan in the featured role. It is a Triangle production made under the direction of Frank Borzage. In the supporting cast with Miss Guinan are Ed. Brady, Francis McDonald and Thornton Edwards. The "Tigress" is the proprietor of a Western dance hall, known as "The Devil's Kitchen," the biggest and toughest dance hall in the mining town of La Mesa. "The Tigress" changes her attitude and becomes a woman with goodness in her soul. This happens because The Gent has arrived in town. The Gent is from Boston, and is known also as "The Collector," the bandit. The Gent makes the best of his acquaintance with The Tigress, and tells her that they should go to a strange town, away from the environment of the dance hall. He leaves under the pretense of acquiring a home, and The Tigress gives him the money she has saved. Shortly afterward she learns that The Gent is in the mining town of Bravos, where he has opened a gambling resort. She writes him that she is coming on to see him. He refuses to let her come, telling her that she has no interest in the place. Realizing that he has given her up, The Tigress leaves for Bravos, and, entering The Gent's resort, shoots the place up and kills The Gent. She leaves with the detective, who has been on The Gent's trail. She tells the detective why she killed The Gent, and the detective, who loves The Tigress, is silent.

Jack Pickford in Judge Willis Brown's Story, "The Spirit of '17"

(Paramount Five Reel Production)

Jack Pickford, whose latest achievements before in the camera in "Tom Sawyer," "Jack and Jill," "The Ghost House," "The Varmint" and others, have won for him a place of highest regard in the minds of the picture-going public, is to be seen on the screen of the ———— theatre on ———— of ———— week, in "The Spirit of '17," written by Judge Willis Brown, senariozed by Julia Crawford Ivers and directed by William S. Taylor. Judge Willis Brown is noted throughout the country for his excellent work in the juvenile courts of Chicago. In the cast are seen Katherine McDonald as leading woman for Mr. Pickford, Edythe Chapman, L. N. Wells, Helen Eddy, Tom Bates and J. W. Johnson. The story deals with the subject of labor disturbances originated by German agents and quelled by a mere boy and a handful of Civil War veterans. Jack Pickford presents the role of Davy Glidden, son of Superintendent Glidden of the Old Soldiers' Home. He is a patriotic loveable youngster of thirteen. The Home is not far from Big Top Copper Mine. Davy is particularly fond of Captain Jerico Norton, an old soldier of about seventy-five years. Mrs. John Edwards and her daughter, Flora, arrive at the Home to pay Mrs. Glidden a visit. Davy has long worshiped Flora, and rejoices over the arrival. The Captain tells stories of the German spies to Davy. Davy's suspicions are aroused by the actions of two men sulking about in the vicinity of the mine. A little later he sees an aeroplane rise from the spot where he had seen the men. He tells the Captain. The Captain recognizes the two men as Carl Bender and Frank Schmale, two who have posed as Swiss citizens, but who are in reality German spies. His adventures in rounding up the spies and defeating their purpose are related by this most interesting picture.

"The Fifth Wheel," an O. Henry Subject, Typical O. Henry Picture

(General Two Reel Production)

"The Fifth Wheel" is an O. Henry story, adapted to the screen and presented in two reels. In the cast are seen W. L. Rodgers, Lydia Yeamans Titus, Charles Wheelock, Patricia Palmer, Chet Ryan and Claire Toner. Like all other O. Henry subjects which you have seen on the screen, "The Fifth Wheel" contains the human note. Thomas McQuade, Van Smythe's coachman, is discharged for drunkenness and joins the "bed-liners" in Madison Square. It is midwinter and cold. Standing beside him is a young man, shabby but neat. They exchange greetings, and McQuade learns that the young man has just been discharged from the hospital without a penny, his wife and child having been obliged to return to her mother. As they are talking a motor dashes down Fifth avenue, and a tire is dropped. McQuade picks it up, and returns it to the owner. He is taken to the home of the Van Smythes, and fed on tea buscuits and wine. While thus enjoying himself, two women are ushered into the side room, where his host, a clairvoyant, tells them Chaldean Chiroscope has been successful, and that "by the fifth wheel of the chariot he shall come." The professor learning that McQuade is ex-coachman for the Van Smythes, throws him out, and he returns to Madison Square. A girl rushes up to him. It is Annie, his sweetheart. She tells him that his old position is open, and suddenly catching sight of the young man she screams Walter, and then it develops that she had accompanied her mistress to a clairvoyant, and he had told her where she would find her sweetheart.

Live News from the Producers

Sidney Drews in Five-Reeler

Richard A. Rowland Will Also Have a Part in This Comedy-Drama, Taken from the Stage Production of "Payday"

THE identity of the mystery play, in which Metro's president, Richard A. Rowland, is to become a screen actor, is at last disclosed. It is a five-reel comedy-drama starring Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew, creators and co-stars in the Metro-Drew comedies. Mr. Rowland's part might best be described as leading juvenile.

The Drew five-act production is the Drews' screen version of "Payday," a melodrama by Lottie M. Meaney and Della Bailey that was played on Broadway not long ago, with Irene Fenwick in the leading role. In the Metro "thriller" that has been made from this production, Mrs. Drew will play a "poor working girl," and Mr. Drew will be seen as a vitally bad man.

Mrs. Drew herself has prepared the screen version of the story, has directed the picture and cut the film. "Payday" has been prepared in a prelude, three episodes and a postlude. While it is distinctly a departure from the usual Drew one-act play, it retains the Drew comedy atmosphere, it is said.

Mr. and Mrs. Drew are now said to be ambitious to present a play with Mr. Rowland as star and Maxwell Karger, studio supervisor, as second lead, but plans for this production are not as yet completed.

"Payday" will be released as a special production.

Serials Strong in Mid-West

Suburban Houses and Small Towns Show Favoritism Toward Continued Pictures — "Mystery Ship" in the Lead

"SERIALS?"

"Who said serials?"

The Middle West said "Serials" and then added, "Some more serials, please." Morning, noon and night exhibitors insist they are just as good money makers as they were when they were first started, according to a representative of Motion Picture News who has gone into the matter thoroughly.

The "logical ending" idea of "The Mystery Ship" is going big, they say. The advertising stunts of this picture, with photo stands, little ships to be given away and other ideas, are being used by many. The Acme Amusement Co. of Lincoln, Neb., bought 1,000 each of them. Fourteen Omaha houses are using this serial.

"I am getting 25 per cent more for the 'Mystery Ship' than I got for the 'Red Ace' and other previous pictures," said Manager John H. Calvert of the Laemmle Omaha exchange. "And it is going bigger than any of them. I have two prints of both these pictures and I have no dates open. Although 'The Bull's Eye' serial is not released until February 1, I have eight bookings for it in my desk and am getting more every day."

H. E. Swan of the Empress theatre, Kearney, Neb., was in Omaha the other day, telling what great things the Vitagraph release, "Fighting Trail," has been doing for his theatre. "It may sound funny, but with the opening episode of the picture, I broke all house records," he said. "At 8 o'clock that night there was not one seat vacant in my 700-capacity theatre. At 8:25 I looked and they were packed out on the walk. I had over 100 standing in the back of the house and in a small balcony with only 7 seats, I counted 40 people at one time. Serials certainly are going great in Kearney."

"The 'Fighting Trail' serial is going better than any I ever saw," said Manager Getzler of the Omaha Vitagraph exchange. "The exhibitors are practically unanimous in saying it is making them money, and big money, too. Our "Vengeance and the Woman" picture is going just as good. I never give a private showing of an episode to an exhibitor that I do not book the serial. When the release date came on December 24, I had a big number of bookings ahead and I am getting more every day."

The serials, of course, are going best in the small towns and in the suburban houses. Twenty-four sheets are being used more liberally this winter than ever before.

"House of Glass" Nearly Ready

"The House of Glass," which is being directed by Emile Chautard, is all but finished. In it Miss Young is supported by a cast including her father, Edward Kimball, her leading man, Corliss Giles, Pell Trenton, Norman Selby (Kid McCoy), James T. Laffey, Josie Sadler, William Waltman, Peggy Burke and Doris Field. When completed, the production will be distributed by Select Pictures.

Chaplin Begins Work on Coast

The New York officers of The First National Exhibitors' Circuit have received news per telegraph from California as follows: "Charlie started work today, will deliver first comedy in six weeks"—which will place the release date of the first comedy in the latter part of February.

A letter from Sid, the comedian's brother, received a day or two previous to the receipt of the wire, caused no little apprehension on the part of the Circuit's officers. It stated that Charlie, while doing a bit of wire walking on the steel roof frame of the new studio lost his balance and came mighty near cancelling his contract by a tumble to the hardwood studio floor, forty feet below.

The Leslie-Glendon Blue Ribbon Completed

Final scenes were made last week for "The Wooing of Princess Pat," the Vitagraph Blue Ribbon feature in which Gladys Leslie and J. Frank Glendon are to be starred.

"Everything happened during the making of this picture except a declaration of war," said Director Earle. "To begin with, we had to make the picture backwards in order to get Mr. Glendon into his scenes and let him start away to California on the schedule that had been laid out for him in beginning the new serial with Hedda Nova, 'The Woman in the Web.'"

"Exhibitor Should Cheer Nation"

Adolph Zukor So Declares in Interview, and Insists Golden Opportunity Lies Before the Live-Wire Showman—Sunshine Is Needed

IN a statement last week to a representative of MOTION PICTURE NEWS, Adolph Zukor, president of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, brought out not only the advisability, but what he terms the absolute necessity of increased endeavors on the part of the exhibitor to cheer the nation.

Mr. Zukor was very emphatic in his declaration that the nation needs just such cheer as the live-wire exhibitors can give. He predicted a wondrous reward for the exhibitors who take advantage of the conditions at present to make their houses the oasis of the war desert for a public that needs encouragement.

Golden Opportunity

"A golden opportunity lies before the motion picture theatre exhibitor of today, which should be grasped at the psychological time," said Mr. Zukor

"It has taken some time for the American public to realize that we are engaged in a mighty war, for the United States has fortunately occupied a position of great prosperity. With hundreds of thousands of our boys going to the front, however, we are beginning to experience the feelings that our allies encountered when their men rallied to the colors, and we should be guided by the events that took place in those countries.

"Our everyday life is being filled with little inconveniences, due to the enormous help this country is giving the allies, and the newspapers teem with war news. Now is the time for the exhibitor to make his house the court of happiness and gladness for his locality, where his patrons will gather to relax the tension of the times, which fact he should bring out in his advertisements in newspapers, and in slides, etc. In so doing he will not only benefit himself but will be performing a patriotic service for his community.

"In times of peace the maxim of 'all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy' was well recognized, and the film industry was brought to its present proportions because the American public thoroughly believed in it. In times of war, with the added mental burdens, the motion picture theatre is more than ever a public necessity.

Wipe Out Gloom

"Don't let your patrons mope in their homes, but bring to them the attractiveness of your theatre by systematic advertising. There is no doubt that millions of people who have not yet been converted to picture patrons can be made regular 'fans' at this time, if they can be induced to appreciate the real benefits derived from attending your theatre.

"Transportation facilities are such that the motion picture must fill the gap in the country's amusements caused by the inability of travelling companies to secure accommodations. Every available car is being utilized to transport food and essentials, and passenger trains have been eliminated from the schedules. Prices of admission for the speaking stage have gone skyward, and now, more than ever, is the picture theatre the cheapest as well as the best form of entertainment.

Adolph Zukor, President of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation

"The entire country is in a prosperous condition, and with the billions of dollars being spent by the government this condition is enhanced. Of course we must not blind ourselves to the fact that the cost of the commodities of life have gone up, and that the government has waged a campaign of conservation which has educated the public to demand value for its money, but this really benefits the better theatre and enables the manager to get higher admission prices. In spetaking with our London representative, J. C. Graham, I find that the same thing occurred in England, where the first class picture houses, after four years of war, are prosperous and those showing cheap films have suffered.

Wilson Backs Pictures

"Great war authorities have declared that the morals of the nations will play an important part in the quick conclusion of the conflict, and the motion picture theatre can play an important part in maintaining the high spirits of the American nation. The exhibitor is now the purveyor of an article—amusement—which the public not only wants but needs.

"President Wilson himself must have anticipated the part the motion picture would take in the war for he declared, after a eulogy of the film, that he proposed to use the picture houses as the quickest means of disseminating information to ALL the people.

"Advertising is now essential to the exhibitor, for he should drive home the fact that HIS is the playhouse of comfort, amusement and entertainment, in which are presented the famous stars of the stage and screen. His advertising must be honest, however, and in many instances it will open the eyes of the exhibitor when he starts his advertising campaign to discover that he has nothing worth-while to advertise if he is not showing the stars and the plays that the public demands.

"Many theatres will take advantage of the conditions which have arisen, and which will become more intense in the near future, and will capture increased patronage and prosperity by broadsides of publicity. Others will not, and they will have no one to blame but themselves and their lack of enterprise and appreciation of the important part they play in the general morale of the nation.

Great Amounts Spent

"It should not be forgotten that the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation has demonstrated its faith in the present condition and the anticipation of the future by spending a million dollars in a great national campaign of education to acquaint the public with the photoplays it produces, and it is backing up this publicity with the best pictures that brains and money can produce. The exhibitor therefore, should surely not ignore the warning I am giving him, and I sincerely hope he will believe the good faith that inspires it. The prosperity of the picture theatre is necessarily our prosperity, and we are desirous of building upon solid ground.

"The year 1918 should be a memorable one in the industry, for it will mark the culmination of important events that had their birth in 1917. Within a few months spring will arrive and with it the great offensives on the battle fronts of Europe. The tension of the war will be at its maximum and the exhibitor has sufficient time, by beginning now, to decide the part his house will play in his locality. And when the war is over, and the country again filled with gladness, it will be a difficult matter to wean patrons from the theatres that established a clientele during the dark hours when entertainment was not merely a pleasure but a necessity."

Rothacker Plant Declares Dividend

Aa a recent meeting of the board of directors of the Rothacker Film Manufacturing Company, held at Chicago, a cash dividend of 7 per cent. was declared on the preferred stock for the fiscal year of 1917. General plans for a large extension of business activities were outlined by President Rothacker and approved by the board.

"Rough and Ready" Cast Chosen

Fox Office Announce Work Is Progressing on Newest William Farnum Picture—Violet Palmer Leads Opposite Star

WORK is progressing rapidly on "Rough and Ready," William Farnum's forthcoming de luxe production, says announcement from the William Fox offices, and the entire company will leave within the next fortnight for a snow-clad region "somewhere in North America." Richard Stanton, who made, among other plays, "The Spy" and "Cheating the Public," is in charge of the direction.

"Every important member of Mr. Farnum's supporting cast has now been selected," read the statement from Mr. Fox. "Miss Violet Palmer," who will be remembered as the petite co-star of 'The Blue Streak,' one of our feature pictures released last year, has been chosen as Mr. Farnum's leading lady. Other players who have prominent parts in the film are Alphonze Either, Jessie Arnold, David Higgins, Frank Newton, Mable Bardine and Franklyn McGlynn.

"In picking this company we have exercised scrupulous care," Mr. Fox continues, "as we want absolute harmony of action. The picture demands an exceptional amount of teamwork for the brilliant success we are confident we shall achieve with it.

"The story of 'Rough and Ready' is one of strongest dramatic intensity and fire. William Farnum is essentially a man of action, a man who does things, and he has been provided with a big, smashing role of the type that has endeared him to motion picture enthusiasts. He has never had a more appealing or more powerful character to portray than 'Bill' Stratton, the hero of this production, whose heart was seared by an unjust accusation, but whose soul remained as white as ever.

"He seeks the far Northland where the trail is as long as the day, to escape the shadow cast over him. It is in Yellow Gulch, in which he is resting from the weariness and monotony of the unending snows, that the complications begin which form the basis for a really absorbingly interesting story."

Constance Talmadge Plans New Feature

"THE SHUTTLE," Select production, starring Constance Talmadge, is announced as only two-thirds finished at the studio in Hollywood, but Miss Talmadge, with her activities alert, has been busily arranging details of her following two productions it was made known last week.

These are to be "Up the Road with Polly," a picturization of the novel by Frances Sterrett, and "Good Night Paul," a screen version of the musical comedy. The screen rights to the latter production have now been secured, and it will take its place in line following Miss Sterrett's work. In these productions Constance Talmadge is presented by Lewis J. Selznick.

Select officials are immensely pleased with the wonderful record that Constance Talmadge productions have made for their company. There has been in no single instance even a suggestion of a complaint or kick from exhibitors playing the productions in which this brilliant young comedienne is starred. On the contrary the Constance Talmadge pictures have not failed in any section of the country to go over with a bang, according to theatre reports received at headquarters.

Fox Uses Biograph Studio in Pinch

Although he recently increased his facilities in the East by taking over the former Victor Studio, William Fox again has found himself cramped for space, and has made a temporary arrangement for utilization of facilities at the Biograph Studio in the Bronx. Director J. Gordon Edwards, now engaged on a picture at Fort Lee, recently worked at the Biograph Studio for a short time, and he has been followed by Richard Stanton who is directing the making of "Rough and Ready," a William Farnum de luxe production. Mr. Farnum later will go North for two or three weeks to do work on locations.

The Victor Studio still is being utilized by Director Harry Millarde, who is making a picture of which June Caprice is the star. Director Carl Harbaugh, at Fort Lee, is retaking some scenes for "Jack Spurlock—Prodigal," the George Walsh Special Feature that is scheduled for release early next month.

Work Progresses Rapidly on "La Tosca"

Work is progressing rapidly on the Victorien Sardou play, "La Tosca," at the Famous Players-Lasky studio in New York, which it is predicted will be the most pretentious offering yet made by Paramount This photoplay is being directed by Edward Jose, and stars Pauline Frederick in the title role.

"Brass Check" Started by Metro

It has been announced by Metro Pictures Corporation that "Under Suspicion," starring Bushman and Bayne, has been completed, and the co-stars have started work in "The Brass Check," which is expected to prove a continuation of the Bushman-Bayne policy of trying to sense the public taste and gratify it accordingly.

In "Under Suspicion" are Hugh Jeffrey, Eva Gordon, Frank Montgomery, Sidney D'Albrook, Franklyn Hanna, Arthur Housman, Sylvia Arnold and Jack Newton.

Theda Bara Makes New Vampire Film

Theda Bara is now at work in filming a new vampire story which was written by herself. This is the first attempt the William Fox star has made at writing a scenario.

The story as constructed by Miss Bara runs the gamut of vampire portrayals and emotions. The scenes include that of the far away mysterious island of Java and the gay life of Paris where the heroine of Miss Bara's story meets a tragic death.

Darwin Karr Returns to the Screen

After an absence of some five years, Darwin Karr, leading man of the old Vitagraph and Essanay military dramas, returns to the screen in a typical "Karr" part, a United States marine private, "Lefty," in the seven-act photoplay, "The Unbeliever." The story is based upon the war novelette, "The Three Things," by Mary Raymond Shipman Andrews and produced at the Thomas A. Edison studios under the direction of Alan Crosland.

Pauline Frederick, the Paramount Star, Is Said to Be a Charming "La Tosca"

McCullough with Storey in Feature

Philo McCullough plays the leading male role of Captain Rodney Willard of the United States Army. Pomeroy Cannon plays the part of Dmitri, character actor. Francis Marion, child player, is seen as the little Czarevitch. The other members of the cast, all of whom have played in leading productions, are Fred Malatesta as the Grand Duke Paul, Charles Gerard as the Grand Duke Orloff, Norma Nichols as Draya, Grace Aide as the Czarina, H. L. Swisher as Kerensky, Harry Moody as Makar, and R. O. Pennell as the Czar.

"Weaver of Dreams" Begun by Metro

Viola Dana, whose last Metro picture was "Blue Jeans," is being directed by John H. Collins in "Weaver of Dreams," in which she is said to have a role similar to the one she had in the former picture.

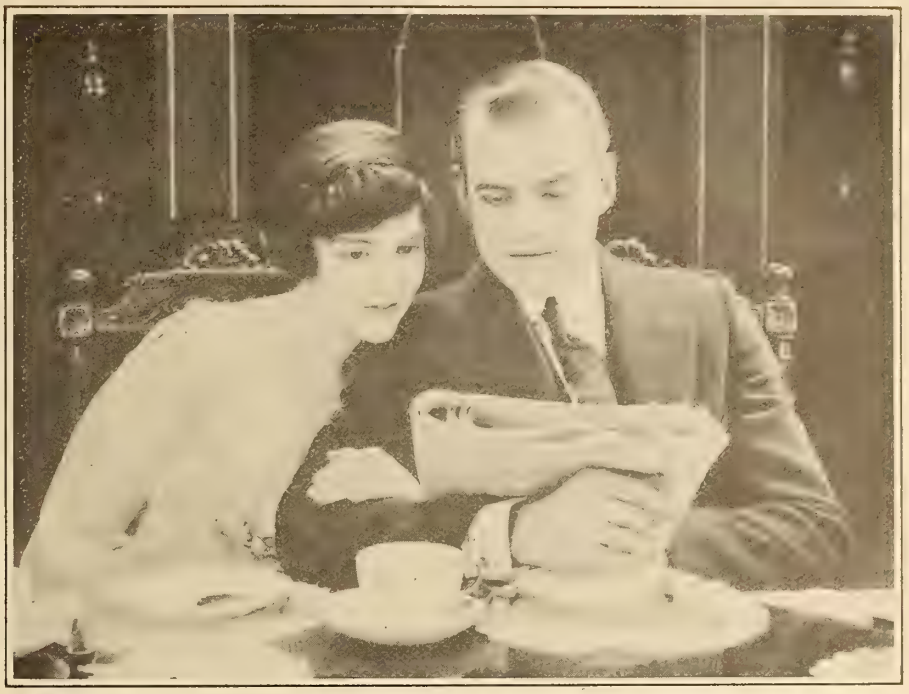
"Weaver of Dreams" is the second of Miss Dana's pictures to be produced at Metro's West Coast studios at Hollywood, which are under the supervision of Western Representative B. A. Rolfe.

"The Winding Trail," the star's first California-made production, is a current release.

Thurston Hall in New Ince Feature

Thurston Hall, who has supported Dorothy Dalton in several Paramount pictures, produced under supervision of Thomas H. Ince, appears again as the Red Rider in "'Flare-Up' Sal," her forthcoming subject, directed by R. William Neill.

Others in the cast are William Conklin who plays the part of Dandy Dave, while the role of Tincup Casey is John P. Lockney. Milton Ross is seen as Lige Higbee.



Niles Welch Appears in "Her Boy"

Niles Welch, popular leading man, is co-starred with Effie Shannon in Metro's new patriotic picture, "Her Boy," adapted for the screen by Albert Shelby Le Vino from H. Carey Wonderly's story, "Conscription," and directed by George Irving.

This is not Welch's first appearance under the Metro banner. His initial engagement with Metro was in a small part in "Always in the Way," starring Mary Miles Minter.

Tourneur Directs "Prunella" Next

Maurice Tourneur, after only a few days rest, following the completion of "The Blue Bird," the Maeterlinck spectacle for Artcraft, undertook the direction of Marguerite Clark in "Prunella" last week, for Paramount.

"Our Little Wife" Is the Endearing Title of Madge Kennedy's Latest Production for Goldwyn

New Marsh Subject Is Chosen

Goldwyn Intends to Give Star Greatest Acting Chance of Her Career—Title Not Yet Chosen—Players Go South

MAE MARSH, according to announced plans of Goldwyn Pictures Corporation, will have one of the best acting chances of her picture career in a new production in which she will appear as the heroine of a romantic story of thoroughbred crookedness. It was written by Irvin S. Cobb, and was published in The Saturday Evening Post, under the title of "The Web." This title may not be used, it is said, for the screen version. Miss Marsh will begin work on it the moment she completes the final scenes of "The Beloved Traitor," from the story by Frank Packard, upon which she has been engaged for several weeks.

Some Goldwyn stars have secured assignments to South Georgia locations during the cold snap—all but Mabel Normand, who was busily completing the last scenes in "Dodging a Million," with Director Tucker, in spite of the handicaps as to heat, light and other necessities under which Fort Lee, N. J., has been laboring since Christmas.

Mabel Normand is still braving prospects of cold weather. She has just begun work in the glass studio on a new Goldwyn picture, as yet unnamed. It will give her, Goldwyn says, as decidedly novel a part as either of the other two pictures she has made for Goldwyn, "Dodging a Million," in which Miss Normand plays a dresser in a modiste's shop suddenly transformed into an heiress, or "Joan of Plattsburg." In her newest picture, Miss Normand invades a newspaper office as "copy girl." From the newspaper office, where she is more or less of a humorous figure, she is launched into the vortex of a criminal plot agitating the underworld and centering about a famous rescue mission. The girl's clever solution of the mystery and the "beat" which she scores for her paper furnish the thrills, dashed with humor, with which the story ends.

Prizma Film, Dorsey-Directed, Tours

AFTER what has been generally conceded to be a very successful run of the Prizma natural-color picture, "Our Navy," at the Forty-fourth Street theatre, New York, the production, which was directed and supervised by Dr. G. A. Dorsey, has closed at that theatre to fill other engagements that have been booked in cities throughout the country.

The success of this achievement of color photography has been generally declared by critics of New York and Boston press to be a "startling revelation."

"Our Navy" portrays the human side of the navy work, producing in the colors attributed only to the sea the spectacular array of our fleet on duty. The sailors are seen going through drills, launching torpedoes, catapulting hydroplanes, firing big guns in broadside after broadside at targets miles away.

Navy officials who have witnessed this picture have been gratified, it is said, to the extent of enthusiastic expressions at the general development that has taken place in the Navy Department, as a whole, and it amply answers the question, "Are We Ready?"

Pathe Completes New Features

Are Ready to Be Assigned Dates on Program, While Producing Forces Keep Well Ahead of the Schedules

FOUR additional Pathe features, "Annexing Bill," "Mr. Slacker," "The Mysterious Client" and "Any Home" have been completed during the past week and are ready to be assigned release dates on the program, Pathe announced this week.

"These four subjects are widely different in theme," said Sales Manager F. C. Quimby, "but in each a strong vein of comedy supplies the element demanded of war time entertainment. "Miss Slacker" is a romance, "The Mysterious Client" is melodramatic in style, "Annexing Bill" is a comedy-drama and "Any Home" is a social problem drama.

"Mrs. Slacker," directed by Hobart Henley, is a story of conditions of the present moment by Agnes Johnston. Gladys Hulette and Creighton Hale appear in the star roles, supported by Paul Clerget and Walter Heirs. The title of this production may be changed to a more descriptive one before the subject is released."

"The Mysterious Client," directed by Fred Wright is a melodramatic fantasy that embodies mystery, surprise and comedy. Irene Castle is starred, supported by Milton Sills, Warner Oland and Caesare Gravina.

"Any Home," a Baby Marie Osborne feature directed by William Bertram from a story by John W. Grey, is a story whose outstanding feature is said to be human interest. It tells of a misguided ambition that results in the neglect of home and baby and the final righting of all wrongs through the influence of the child.

"Annexing Bill" is another Gladys Hulette-Creighton Hale feature, directed by Albert Parker from a story by Edgar Franklin that appeared in Argosy.

Mr. Quimby says that all of these productions have been staged with elaborate care and extraordinary effort has been expended to make them rate far above the average good feature.

Clara Kimball Young Is Star of Select's "The House of Glass"

Taxi Torn Up for Realistic Scenes

Emile Chautard, director of Clara Kimball Young, last week dissected a taxi and mounted it on a truck for scenes in which the star was to appear. This action was secured in Broadway, New York, while pedestrians looked on in astonishment.

Whartons Use Photography Tricks

According to an announcement last week, the reputation the Whartons have made for trick photography is to be fully upheld in "The Eagle's Eye," their new serial photodrama founded on Chief Flynn's exposure of the Imperial German Government's spies in America. To carry out the idea of many of the situations showing spy activities, trick exposures have been found necessary to attain the most convincing effects. One of these effects is a quadruple exposure, while another is a triple iris in which three diaphragms open at once in the disclosure of characters, then fade and then reopen. This last effect, which is made in "The Eagle's Eye" for the first time, was originated by John K. Hollbrook, chief of photography at the Wharton Studios.

Detail Is a Goldwyn Keynote

In regard to the correctness of detail, as well as its completeness, in "Fields of Honor," starring Mae Marsh, Goldwyn announced this week that the picture is replete with historic scenes, as nearly correct as research and care can make them.

One of the big moments of the subjects is said to be a reproduction of the assassination of Francis Ferdinand at Sarajevo, which event was made the primary cause of the present world war by the Central Powers.

Two Crisp-Directed Films On Broadway

DURING the week of January 13 two of Paramount's pictures directed by Donald Crisp held sway on Broadway, one showing at the Rialto and the second at the Rivoli. The subjects were, "Rimrock Jones," starring Wallace Reid, and George Beban's "Jules of the Strong Heart."

Donald Crisp has been a producer in the Famous Players-Lasky organization for more than a year and has turned out productions including the George Beban series and the two Julian Eltinge pictures. His work led to the immediate renewal of his contract when it expired recently, and he has been assigned to direct Wallace Reid in the eastern studios.

In commenting on the two current productions the New York Tribune said: "Donald Crisp has directed two such splendid pictures—pictures which have real persons and real situations in them—that we feel impelled to say something about him right at the start. At the Rialto Mr. Crisp is responsible for George Beban's 'Jules of the Strong Heart,' and 'Rimrock Jones,' with Wallace Reid in the title role is the chief pictorial attraction at the Rivoli." Both pictures are then strongly praised in the article.

Lockwood Returns from Maine Woods

After working for three weeks at their location camp on the Rangeley Lakes in Maine, Harold Lockwood and his company of Metro-Yorke players have finished the lumber camp scenes in "Broadway Bill," Lockwood's next Metro Star Series production, and have returned to New York, where the final scenes to complete the picture will be put on.

"Broadway Bill" is a story of a wealthy young man who goes from New York to the woods to work out his regeneration. Fred J. Balshofer wrote the story and also directed the production.

Rodney Plays Lead with Enid Bennett

Tom Gale, a role in "The Keys of the Righteous," will be played by Earl Rodney, as the leading man in Enid Bennett's first Paramount picture, produced by Thomas H. Ince and directed by Jerome Storm.

George Nichols has a characterization, and others in the cast who will add to the finished production are Joseph Swickard, Carl Forms, Gertrude Claire and Lydia Knott.

Hotaling Completes His 700th Comedy

Arthur D. Hotaling has completed his 700th comedy: "The Soup and Fish Ball." And this means 700 comedies without one written line of script. Mr. Hotaling is one of the pioneers of the comedy-producing field.

General Film reports continued and growing popularity for Essanay's one-reel comedies, as well as the one-a-week scenics. The release for January 26 on the scenic program is "A Romance of Rails and Power," a story built around the electrification of railroads and starring Virginia Valli.

Vitagraph Players Go South for Scenes

A company of Vitagraphers, headed by Harry Morey and Florence Deshon, who are to be featured in "The Desired Woman," left last week for Georgia, where they will be engaged for a week or more in making scenes for the forthcoming Blue Ribbon production.

Paul Scardon is directing the picture, and in addition to Mr. Morey and Miss Deshon, he took South with him Jean Paige.

New Fox Player

Miss Ivy Deibel, the nineteen-year-old Cleveland girl who won the distinction of having the best "camera face" out of a field of 1,300 contestants, was cast last week by William Fox for a part in June Caprice's forthcoming Special Feature, "The Heart of Romance." Harry Millarde is directing this subject.

"Sixes" Cast Is Assembled

George K. Spoor Declares Country Was Combed to Get Suitable Types—Stage Players Among Those Selected for Roles

GEORGE K. SPOOR has announced the cast on "A Pair of Sixes," a Taylor Holmes production, now in the making. The entire country was scoured to get the players most suitable for their parts in support of Mr. Holmes, it is claimed.

Mr. Holmes will play the part of T. Boggs Johns, the pill manufacturer and later butler in the home of George Nettleton, his business partner, as a result of a game of cards. Nettleton is to be interpreted by Robert Conness, the well-known stage star.

Mr. Spoor also has secured the services of Maude Eburne, who created the role of "Coddles" in the stage presentation of Edward Peple's farce-comedy. Charles E. Ashley, who created the role of Krome in the original stage production, will play that part.

Alice Mann, a screen actress, will appear as Florence Cole.

Cecil Owens, who will play Vanderholt, is now appearing in Chicago with Jane Cowl in "Lilac Time." Edna Phillips Holmes takes the part of Mrs. Nettleton. Others in the cast are John Cossar as Mr. Applegate, Byron Aldenn as Tony Tolor, Virginia Bowker as Sallie Parker, and Tommy Carey as Jimmie, the office boy.

Assembling of Mr. Holmes' newly completed Spoor feature, "Ruggles of Red Gap," is about completed. Mr. Holmes is even more enthusiastic over this picture than "Uneasy Money," which is now showing throughout the country.

Twenty-One Authors In Vitagraph List

WHAT Vitagraph cites as an example of the efforts it is making to provide the best literary material obtainable for the screen is supplied in a list of authors now contributing to the Vitagraph program, a copy of which is given out by Albert E. Smith, president of the company. The list shows more than twenty-one fiction writers are represented in Vitagraph pictures now booking, in process of production or in preparation. They are: Robert W. Chambers, Hamlin Garland, Geo. Randolph Chester and Lillian Chester, Alfred Henry Lewis, O. Henry, James Oliver Curwood, Frederick Upham Adams, George Barr McCutcheon, Harold MacGrath, Cyrus Townsend Brady, Edward Peple, Earle Derr Biggers, E. Phillips Oppenheim, Will Harben, Lowell Otis Reese, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, Mollie Elliott Seawell, Bayard Veiller, Florence Morse Kingsley, Frederick Arnold Kummer, Edith Ellis.

This list is considered by Vitagraph a splendid argument in favor of better pictures and a strong answer to the carping critics of the photoplay whose pet diversion is assailing the literary merit of screen productions.

Hamlin Garland, member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, is represented on the Vitagraph program by "The Captain of the Grey Horse Troop" and "Money Magic," and "Cavanaugh of the Forest Rangers."

James Oliver Curwood has been one of the most frequent contributors to Vitagraph and his greatest story, "Baree, the Son of Kazan," soon will be in production.

George Randolph Chester and his wife have given many stories to the screen, as have Cyrus Townsend Brady, Frederick Upham Adams and others included in the list.

"Fields of Honor" Scores

Goldwyn declares that Mae Marsh's record in her two previous productions for that company is being equaled with her newest subject, "Fields of Honor," which it announces has received excellent reviews from all the critics.

Goldwyn Cites Picture Effect

Claims Credit for Its Share in Providing Powerful Features to Bring Public Back to Box-Office—Always Welcome

ACCORDING to an announcement this week from Goldwyn, bringing the public back to the box-office is in no sense a superhuman task, providing the producers of pictures do their bit by making powerful pictures.

Goldwyn claims credit for its share in this work and points to reports from picture theatres on attendance secured by the past four Goldwyn releases: "The Auction Block," Madge Kennedy in "Nearly Married," Mae Marsh in "The Cinderella Man" and Mary Garden in "Thais."

Regarding this angle of the picture art, Goldwyn said: "Much mystery is made in the industry of the means of determining 'what the public wants' in the way of screen productions, and the explorer from the outside who listens to screen magnates must find their conversations and deductions vastly amusing. As a matter of fact, there is little difficulty in determining in advance the composition of successful pictures—meaning pictures that will bring money into exhibitors' theatres.

"Despite the great emphasis laid upon stars in screen production, it is proved week in and week out that poor stories will cripple and damage the reputation of even the greatest of stars, and it is therefore obvious that the story is of first concern in any well conducted producing organization. From the beginning Goldwyn has laid emphasis upon its stories and the sources from which they are obtained.

"'Nearly Married,' Edgar Selwyn's play, had proved its earning value on the stage, and with Madge Kennedy as the star when transplanted to the screen it at once duplicated its former record and brought the public flocking into picture theatres everywhere."

General Claims Centralization Credit

IN speaking of the situation brought about by the expansion of General Film Company as an exchange system for increased product, an official of the organization said last week: "The extravagance that has been practised for years in the duplication of exchange service received its first notable correction when General Film undertook to extend its facilities to the trade at large. Here was the 'clearing-house' idea, or central station idea, in practical form and first to be worked out. Big product immediately availed itself of General Film facilities under this plan.

"The result was so immediately successful that the attention of the entire trade became riveted upon General Film's innovation. Unnecessary overhead, for one thing, was done away with in this notable object lesson, and for another thing the exhibitor was so pleased with being able to book a variety of brands at one exchange that it now seems this should have been done long ago for his convenience if for no other reason. But the other reasons are highly important and contain the elements of the industry's salvation. The economy in handling motion picture product is so considerable in the use of one competent, efficient exchange organization like General Film, that it must save money for the exhibitor and the manufacturer and stabilize the whole industry.

"It is not surprising that the initiative taken with such excellent results by General Film should be followed with somewhat similar action by other thoughtful motion picture interests. In addition to having taken the lead, General Film has a natural position of advantage. It is the oldest organized system devoted to film merchandising. The thoroughness of its organization is demonstrated by its ease in assimilating huge additional business which occurred without the slip of a single cog in its great machinery. Moreover it is exclusively a service company, having no finger in manufacturing nor in the ownership of theatres."

Universal Begins Third Serial Feature

With "The Mystery Ship" running current and "The Bull's Eye" ready to start releasing February 4, Universal has begun operations on a third serial to keep the chapter-story pot boiling. Ben Wilson and Neva Gerber have reached the tenth episode of "The Mystery Ship," and Eddie Polo and Vivian Reed will be the featured adventurers in "The Bull's Eye."

The new serial will have a jungle plot where wild animals abound, and Marie Walcamp in "The Tiger's Claws" will no doubt find tests of her courage in handling the menagerie at Universal City during a series of adventures Jacques Jaccard has planned.

King Baggot Comments on Serial

"The best work I have ever done in my life—and the greatest incentive and inspiration to good work I have ever experienced," is the quoted opinion of King Baggot concerning his part of "Harrison Grant," president of the Criminology Club, in the new Wharton serial photodrama, "The Eagle's Eye," by William J. Flynn, recently retired Chief of the United States Secret Service, exposing the plots and propaganda of the Imperial German Government in America.

"The picture itself is absolutely the most interesting thing I have ever heard of," said Mr. Baggot. "Until I began to work in this production I had no idea that the Imperial German Government could have been guilty of the thousand and one crimes which it committed in its efforts to cripple America and make this country a weakling in the face of war."

Goldwyn Claims Big Audiences for "Thais"

Goldwyn this week announced that reports of big audiences drawn to theatres by the advertising value of Mary Garden's name have come from far and wide, the Queen theatre of Houston, Tex., agreeing almost exactly in its estimates with the Orpheum of Chicago. The Regent in Toronto, Goldwyn says, played to the biggest audiences in its history and topped the highest previous record by 10 per cent.

War Song Dedicated to Madge Evans

Great Things Expected of "Stella Maris"

According to statements from Artcraft offices, Mary Pickford's next Artcraft release, "Stella Maris," is confidently expected by that company to prove a sensation throughout the country. That the latest Mary Pickford photoplay should prove a big success is stated by Adolph Zukor, D. W. Griffith and others.

In this play, adapted by Frances Marion and staged by Marshall Neilan, Miss Pickford appears in a dual role.

Another Russian Story for Miss Brady

Alice Brady, whose latest Select production, "The Knife," has been based on the play of the same name by Eugene Walter, is to go far afield in her next Select Picture.

Opposite the soldier-actor will be Lois Meredith, and others in the cast are Arthur Donaldson, "Mother" Mary Maurice and Julia Swayne Gordon.

President Smith and Wilfrid North, production manager for Vitagraph, are in personal charge of the production, with Empey assisting in the staging and production of scenes.

Select Adopts Selling Slogan

Alice Brady's Newest Select Picture Is "The Knife"

Arthur S. Kane Suggests "Stars to Sell Stars" and Phrase Is Used to Sum Up Progressive Policy of the Organization

SELECT PICTURES CORPORATION has adopted the slogan "Stars to Sell Stars," as applied to its sales organization. This phrase, used to sum up the progressive policy followed by Select in building up its distribution machinery, is the choice of General Manager Arthur S. Kane.

Mr. Kane said: "Recognizing the fact that in the motion picture industry conditions of sale and the product sold have vastly changed, Select Pictures Corporation has within the last three and a half months built up a sales organization carefully calculated to be best suited to the conditions which today surround the sale of high-grade pictures. The guiding thought in the rounding out of this organization has been that the proper handling of a quality product calls for a quality salesman. Paralleling this idea has been the determination to make Select's representatives in every territory of the United States the commanding figures in their respective fields. With this end in view, every manager put in charge of a Select branch has been chosen as being pre-eminent in the district of which his branch is the center. In other words, he has been selected because as regards that particular field he is a Sales Specialist. In this way territory after territory has been covered for Select Pictures by the appointment of a specialist for each territory, so that now the organization is complete, from Atlantic to Pacific, and from Canada to the Gulf."

Hearst-Pathe Has Anniversary

Has Been Seven Years in Existence, First as "Weekly" and One Year as "News"—Many Prints Are Issued

WITH 1918 the Hearst-Pathe News, or at least the Pathe "Weekly" end of it, celebrates its seventh anniversary. During that time not an issue has been missed, not once has it failed to come out on time, according to Pathe.

Pathe goes on record as stating that more prints are issued of each number of the News than are put out on any other weekly, and that this number, judging from sources of information, considered good and reliable, is from 40 per cent to 50 per cent higher than that of any other news pictorial.

Pathe said: "The motion picture news weekly, first conceived by Charles Pathe eleven years ago in 1907, today has a power that at first was not dreamed of. Its strength is so great that it is invoked to aid the Government in matters of national welfare. The Hearst-Pathe News was and is of great aid in stimulating recruiting for the army, navy, and aviation corps; it was of great assistance in helping the Red Cross attain its ambitions in acquiring its big membership and in depicting the work done by the organization; it was called upon to aid both of the Liberty Bond issues and did so constantly, week after week with cartoons, titles and pictures. Unlike newspapers it has no politics and favors no candidate. It is unbiased save in the interests of truth, justice and patriotism. It knows no church as distinguished from another, yet it is a force for Morality and the Right. Its views cannot be bought. Each issue is of such a character that it may be safely shown in any church without censorship and without cutting, and yet it is always interesting. Of what other class of pictures can all this be truthfully said?

"The Hearst-Pathe News is undoubtedly to be found in more and better theatres than any brand of pictures on the market. Take New York for an example. Most of the first-class, nationally known houses are regular customers. Among them are theatres such as the Strand, the Rivoli, the New York and the Palace. A while ago a census was taken of the Broadway houses booking it. It was found that every Broadway theatre with but one exception, from the Battery to the Bronx was showing it."

You are not going to war. The men who are need all the comforts you can give them. Help them get cigarettes. That is your patriotic duty. If you aren't helping in the "smokes" campaign, get busy—now. Don't be a slacker!

Exhibitor Clune presented the first Paralta play, "A Man's Man," with J. Warren Kerrigan.

Lobbies Are Real Sales Makers, Says Carlton

Producer of "The Grain of Dust" Declares Many Exhibitors Overlook Possibilities

"If more exhibitors realized the tremendous potential sales value of their lobbies, and devoted more thought and time to the problem of developing their possibilities, there would be a marked increase in business," in the opinion of Carle E. Carlton, president of the Crest Pictures, which has just completed "The Grain of Dust," starring Lillian Walker and directed by Harry Ravier.

"What the exhibitor ought to do is to regard his lobby as the equivalent of the merchant's show window. If he once gets imbued with that fundamental idea, he will see all sorts of opportunity to utilize his lobby space to pull trade.

"If the merchant, by judicious and unique displays, can assemble a crowd in front of his store, and attract patronage in that way, the picture house manager can do the same thing.

"This does not mean for him to see how many posters he can crowd into a given space, nor how jarring a color combination he can contrive to make, but it means placing posters or photographs, or oil paintings, or whatever the means of display may be, in such a way as to draw the passer-by into the lobby. And if said passer-by has any leisure on hands at that moment, the chances are much in your favor, so far as enrolling him as a patron is concerned.

"Don't make your lobby walls look like a weather-worn billboard. This circus style is all glare and no punch. Focus the attention, group your advertising material, so that its message will have the strongest pull. That is the only way to get results."

Working with Dillon are Jack Gilbert, well-known juvenile, who is back with Triangle; Myrtle Lind, one of the Triangle-Keystone beauties; Myrtle Rishell, a newcomer at the Culver City studios who plays the society matron; Gene Burr, George Pearce, Anna Dodge, Percy Challenger and J. P. Wilde. The working title of Dillon's new story is "Betty Comes Home."

Director Gilbert P. Hamilton is making rapid strides on his latest picture, "A Soul in Trust," in which Belle Bennett is playing the featured part, supported by J. Barney Sherry, Darrell Foss, Lee Hill, Lillian West, Grover Franke and others.

Triangle Director Thomas Heffron and a company including Bill Desmond, Jack Richardson, Mary Warren, John Lynce, Lillian Langdon and others have been spending the week at San Pedro harbor, where they have been working on the Triangle three-masted barkentine, Fremont, on a story of the Carribean Sea, in which Bill Desmond is a swashbuckling pirate.

H. O. Davis, vice-president and general manager of the Triangle Film Corporation, is back at the helm at the Culver City studios after a business trip to New York, and the feature companies are working overtime in a drive to gain on the exceptional production schedule set by Mr. Davis for 1918.

East and West in February Metros

Five Stars Will Be Presented in Four Productions, Representing Studios on Both Coasts—First Is "Under Suspicion," with Bushman and Bayne

THE Eastern productions and two productions made in Metro's West Coast Studio at Hollywood, Cal., will be released by Metro Pictures Corporation during the month of February. Five stars will be represented—Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne, Harold Lockwood, Viola Dana and Edith Storey—appearing in the order named.

B. A. Rolfe presents the West Coast pictures, "Weaver of Dreams" and "Revenge." Added to these will be a special production, with Nazimova as star—a new gypsy play now in process of completion. Four Drew comedies will also be released during February. These are "Help Wanted," "The Bright Lights Dimmed," "After Henry," and "His Generosity," in the order named.

Smiles and Thrills

The first February release will be "Under Suspicion," a feature comedy melodrama, starring Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne. William S. Davis directed this five-act production, which had been adapted by Albert Shelby Le Vino from the original story by Hugh C. Weir. Smiles and thrills are said to be provided in this picture in about equal proportions. Mr. Bushman takes the part of a young millionaire, Gerry Simpson, who falls in love with a girl reporter at a society function. The girl reporter, Virginia Blake, played by Miss Bayne, has a horror of the idle rich, so young Simpson goes to work. He becomes a cub reporter. Some jewels belonging to a wealthy woman are stolen, and suspicion points strongly to Gerry. The girl reporter finds a clue, and begins to track the culprit. A monkey provides the "missing link" in the evidence.

The real thief is the person least suspected, of course, and there are thrilling scenes of excitement and adventure before the donouement takes place. The co-stars are surrounded by a cast including Eva Gordon, Hugh Jeffrey, Frank Montgomery, and Sidney D'Albrook.

Lockwood Is Second

"Broadway Bill," with Harold Lockwood as star, will be released Feb. 11. It is a romance of Broadway and the North woods, written and directed by Fred J. Balshofer, and contains a part for the star said to be wholly to his liking.

"Broadway Bill" is given his nickname on account of his fondness for the bright lights of the "big town." The gayeties of Broadway lead him insidiously into the habit of drink, but at last, finding that he has lost the good opinion of Muriel Latham, the girl who matters, he determines to go to the Maine woods and win back his self-respect. He finds a new enemy to fight, this time a personal one, Buck Hardigan, foreman of the lumber camp. For a time it looks as though the fight would be decided against Bill, but he finally succeeds in vanquishing both his antagonists, drink and Buck Hardigan.

A Lockwood picture always has a fight, and sometimes more than one, concealed within its five reels. "Broadway Bill" is no exception. The picture also has a blizzard, the photographer having built a canopy over his camera in order to obtain "flashes."

Harold Lockwood Is Making "Broadway Bill" for Metro

Martha Mansfield plays the part of Muriel Latham, opposite the star, and Stanton Heck has the role of the camp bully, Buck Hardigan.

Directed by Collins

Metro's February 18 release is "Weaver of Dreams," with Viola Dana as star. This is a picture version of Myrtle Reed's story, with Miss Dana in the role of Judith. John H. Collins directed "Weaver of Dreams" at Metro's West Coast studio.

Metro claims that Miss Dana has seldom had a part more suited to her personality than that of Judith. The action of "Weaver of Dreams" takes place in a rural community where the simpler emotions hold sway, giving the star another opportunity to display the sincerity that many consider her chief charm. "Weaver of Dreams" is primarily a drama of the human heart, it is said.

A cast of excellence surrounds Miss Dana in this picture. Clifford Bruce, well known to Metro patrons, has the role of Carter Keith. Mr. Bruce has played opposite Miss Dana in "The Winding Trail," and in her special production, "Blue Jeans," has the important part of Ben Boone. Russell Simpson has an important part. Cora Drew plays Aunt Cynthia Bancroft, who has a belated romance.

"Revenge" Is Last

The final February release is "Revenge," with Edith Storey as star. "Revenge" is described as a Western story of love and adventure, adapted from Edward Moffat's novel, "Hearts Steadfast," the scenario being the work of William Parker and H. P. Keeler. Tod Browning, who directed Miss Storey in "The Legion of Death" and in "The Eyes of Mystery," also directed "Revenge."

Alva Leigh, an Eastern girl, goes West to avenge the death of her fiancee, Donald Jaffray. Two men befriend her, Dick Randall, formerly Donald's cabin-mate, and "Sudden" Duncan, owner of the dance hall. One of them does so with a friendly purpose, and the other hoping to conceal his real enmity toward herself and the dead man. She realizes that all is not as it should be, but is led to false conclusions. Tragedy enters, and death stalks near. The leading man is Wheeler Oakman. Alberta Ballard has the role of "Tiger Lil" and Ralph Lewis is "Sudden Duncan.

Ten Paralta Plays Ready for Release

W. W. Hodkinson this week announced that ten Paralta plays, featuring the three stars, Kerrigan, Barriscale and Walthall, are now practically ready for distribution.

It is pointed out that these plays, prepared so long ahead as they have been, allow the Paralta Company to live up to the high standard of quality which they have set. It is also pointed out that this is a very solid guarantee of the solidity of Hodkinson plans and distribution.

The ten plays which are now ready are the following: "A Man's Man," with J. Warren Kerrigan; "Madam Who?" with Bessie Barriscale; "His Robe of Honor," with Henry B. Walthall; "The Turn of a Card," with Kerrigan; "Humdrum Brown," with Walthall; "With Hoops of Steel," with Walthall; "Rose o' Paradise," with Bessie Barriscale, and "Within the Cup," "Blindfolded" and "Patriotism," all with Miss Barriscale.

Beginning with the week of Sunday, February 3, Pathe announces that there will be issued every week after that date a one-reel Rolin comedy featuring Harold Lloyd.

The first of these one-reel comedies to go out on the increased schedule is "The Lamb," which will be issued on February 3. The second will be "The Gasoline Wedding" on February 10, the third "Hit Him Again" on February 17 and the fourth will probably be "Beat It" on February 24.

Both men are prominent salesmen of the Middle West.

March Blue Ribbons Announced

Alice Joyce Leads Off In "The Song of the Soul," and "The Desired Woman" Follows—Strong Program

THE March list of Blue Ribbon features to be released by Vitagraph is announced by Albert E. Smith, president of the company, as follows:

March 4—"The Song of the Soul," featuring Alice Joyce with an all-star company.

March 11—"The Desired Woman," featuring Harry Morey with Florence Deshon.

March 18—"An American Live Wire," featuring Earle Williams with Grace Darmond.

March 25—"The Home Trail," featuring Nell Shipman with Alfred Whitman.

This promises an unusually strong program under the Blue Ribbon banner for the first spring month, presenting as it does several of Vitagraph's most prominent stars. In addition, the Vitagraph announcement states that each of the plays scheduled contains a strong story.

In the first of the March releases, "The Song of the Soul," Alice Joyce has with her a company including Walter McGrail, Percy Standing, Barney Randall, Stephen Carr, Edith Reeves and others, and Tom Terriss, who directed the picture, is said to have produced one of the best pictures of his career.

"The Desired Woman" marks the advent of Will Harben as a motion picture author. The play is from the book of th same title and exhibitors are promised one of Harry Morey's best efforts. This picture will mark the second appearance on the Vitagraph program of Florence Deshon the Seattle girl who was lured from the legitimate stage into pictures and scored such a sensation as the adventuress in "The Auction Block."

"An American Live Wire," in which Earle Williams is to be starred, is the first picture the Vitagrapher has made on the Pacific Coast in more than five years. It is an adaptation from the O. Henry story, "The Lotus and the Bottle," which, as O. Henry fans will recall, is one of the group of stories included in the "Cabbages and Kings" volume. Grace Darmond, who was seen opposite Mr. Williams in "In the Balance," plays the leading feminine role.

Corinne Griffith, Vitagraph Star

"The Home Trail" is the third of the pictures with Nell Shipman and Alfred Whitman as a team. Their first was "The Wild Strain," by George Randolph Chester and Lillian Chester, and the second "Cavanaugh of Forest Rangers," which is to be released in February. The mysterious Mojave Desert supplies the locale for the story of "The Home Trail," which is laid in the early seventies, and William Wolbert, who is directing it, is said to have picked his locations with the same remarkable care as he did in the case of "The Flaming Omen," one of the most artistic productions Vitagraph has put forth in a year.

World Sets "Cross Bearer" Release Date

IT was announced last week that "The Cross Bearer," in seven reels, will be released by World Pictures, Brady Made, on March 18.

This picture play has Cardinal Mercier as its principal personage and Belgium as its setting. It is to be issued upon the regular World program at regular World prices, in keeping with the fixed policy of this corporation.

"The Cross Bearer" will be the third special feature to be distributed to exhibitors of World Pictures without extra cost. "Rasputin, the Black Monk," and "The Burglar" were released similarly, at greatly increased expenditure on the manufacturer's part. Like these productions "The Cross Bearer" was made as a personal venture by William A. Brady and purchased by the World Film Corporation for its regular patrons by way of demonstrating that big features can be brought within the reach of program houses.

One of the big scenes of "The Cross Bearer" is said to be an authentic reproduction of the Louvain Cathedral, in which Cardinal Mercier is celebrating mass when the German forces rush in and take possession, ejecting the congregation, piling up the seats and setting fire to them, and afterward making a barracks of the edifice.

Stanley Theatres Use Local Events

The management of the Stanley theatre in Philadelphia, which is under the direction of the Stanley Company, has added still another feature to its regular programs. The new attraction is the work of the Stanley cinema man, who with his camera secures the pictures of interesting happenings in all parts of the city. Every day at noon hour the Stanley camera man can be found engaged in "picturizing" the crowds at Broad and Chestnut. The screen at the Stanley theatre soon afterward reveals the fruits of his endeavors.

Petrova Feature Comes February 1

Immediately following the announcement that the title, "The Light Within," has been chosen for the second production in which Madame Olga Petrova will appear, the release date for this feature has been set. "The Light Within" will be released on Friday, February 1, on which date the photoplay will be distributed through the exchanges of the First National Exhibitors' Circuit.

The premier of the second production, starring Madame Olga Petrova under the banner of her own organization, is expected to take place at either the Rialto or the Rivoli.

Larry Trimble directed.

"Hidden Purpose" Released January 27

The next Paramount-Mack Sennett comedy, entitled "His Hidden Purpose," will be released January 27. This comedy, it is announced, is a regular Laura Jean Libby melodrama turned into a merri-drama disclosing the persecuted heroine, the hampered hero, the vile villain and the scheming father.

There are three elopements in "His Hidden Purpose," as well as several good all-around fights, a few kidnappings and a "smashing" clever climax. Marie Prevost plays the Girl, Chester Conkling the Villain, Gene Rogers the Father, Neal Burns the Sweetheart, and Frank Cooper the Boarding House Keeper.

Jacksonville Sends Praise to Zukor

In a telegram to Adolph Zukor, president of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, concerning "The Seven Swans," with Marguerite Clark, the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce said: "Marguerite Clark in 'Seven Swans' viewed by leading citizens, public bodies and committee from our Chamber of Commerce. Paeans of praise from all. Permit us in our humble way to express our everlasting gratitude to J. Searle Dawley for his quick and accurate perception of Florida scenery in 'Seven Swans.' It is a masterpiece. Florida has ever been the sought-for land of romance since 1492. 'Seven Swans' will go down in art of mirrored reflections as the eighth wonder of the art world."

Some of the exteriors of the picture were secured at Jacksonville.

Kerrigan New Picture Ready Shortly

J. Warren Kerrigan, whose first Paralta play, "A Man's Man," has been released, will be seen in the near future in his second Paralta play, "The Turn of a Card," from the pen of Frederick Chapin, which will be released by the W. W. Hodkinson Corporation, the first of February.

The production was made under the direction of Oscar Apfel and photographed by L. Guy Wilkey, both of whom assisted in the making of Kerrigan's former Paralta plays.

"Beauty and the Rogue" Ready

Mary Miles Minter Is Star of New American-Mutual which Is Scheduled for January 28—George Periolat in Cast

IN Mary Miles Minter's next American-Mutual production, titled "Beauty and the Rogue," which will be released on the Mutual schedule January 28, this star will appear in a role quite different from any character she has yet portrayed, Mutual claims.

As Bobbie Lee, the unsophisticated daughter of a wealthy and doting father, she is interested in the work of an "uplift" society and is imposed upon by an ex-burglar who works on her sympathies and promises to "go straight." He did "go straight" away, but only after he had taken her jewels, some of which he sold to the young chap who had fallen in love with "Bobbie," and the young fellow was pinched as the thief when he presented "Bobbie" with her own brooch.

George Periolat, who plays the father, will have his first opportunity for aeons to wear real human clothes, as heretofore he has been camouflaged as decrepid misers, crazy sea-captains, bibulous beach-combers, and old man roles, until the public has almost forgotten what he looks like.

The Strand Comedy, released January 29, stars Billie Rhodes in a peppery farce titled "Somebody's Widow." Billie poses as the inconsolable young widow of a victim of the sea, in order to captivate a bumptious young scenario writer who is immune to feminine charms.

The "Mutual Weekly," the topical news reel, is released on January 28.

New Jewel Comes on March 4

"The Doctor and the Woman" Was Directed by Lois Weber, with Mildred Harris as Star—Private Show First

FOLLOWING in the wake of the announcement by Jewel of the success of Mildred Harris in "The Price of a Good Time," it is this week made known by that organization that the next feature produced by Lois Weber and starring Mildred Harris will be released March 4, under title "The Doctor and the Woman."

"The Doctor and the Woman" is an adaptation of Mary Roberts Rinehart's novel, "K," and tells a story of the struggles of a great surgeon to regain the confidence lost after the failure of several operations on which he was considered a world-wide authority.

Through a series of coincidences in which he plays father confessor to various persons in trouble, "K," as the mysterious doctor is known, saves the life of his rival by the same operation that previously proved his undoing, his former failures explained by the confession of a jealous nurse. "K" finds happiness in a newfound love of which he had been totally oblivious and again devotes his life to the ills of mankind.

True Boardman, is entrusted with the role of "K," while Albert Rosco, Zella Caull, Carl Miller and others make up the balance of the cast.

The picture is said to be one of Miss Weber's most appealing productions, and in point of photography and unusual titling is considered her masterpiece.

A private showing will be arranged this week for exhibitors in the metropolitan territory, after which the Jewel sales organization will be ready for New York bookings.

Director Charles Avery set another high-speed mark when he completed his latest one-reel comedy, "A Good Elk," in less than two days.

Triangle-Keystone director Reggie Morris is suffering with a slight attack of the grippe and will probably rest for a week or two. During the absence of Morris, there will be no delay in the extensive work which Director of comedy production, Albert Glassmire, has planned. Ferris Hartman has taken over the two-reel comedy which was prepared for Morris's next picture and is rehearsing a big company. Work of filming this production will be well under way this week.

You are not going to war. The men who are need all the comforts you can give them. Help them get cigarettes. That is your patriotic duty. If you aren't helping in the "smokes" campaign, get busy—now. Don't be a slacker!

More Energy Behind Serial Films

Carl Laemmle, president and director general of Universal Film Manufacturing Co., is applying more energy, it is announced, to the production of serials than ever before in the history of that organization. It has, previously, been Universal's rule to finish the release of one chapter-serial before starting to circulate its successor; but now serials will overlap serials throughout the coming year.

Under the new plan, Eddie Polo and Vivian Reed's serial, "The Bull's Eye" starts circulation February 4, when Ben Wilson and Neva Gerber's adventures in "The Mystery Ship" has reached its eleventh episode. Work has already begun on "The Lion's Claws" in which Marie Walcamp will be presented under the direction of Jacques Jaccard who also produced "The Red Ace" and "Liberty, A Daughter of the U. S. A." serials in which Miss Walcamp furnished chapter sensations during the past year.

Texas Guinan Is Starred in Triangle's "The Gun Woman," for January 27 Release

"Her American Husband" Listed

Triangle Arranges Feature with Darrell Foss and Teddy Sampson for January 27—Guinan Picture Also Scheduled

AS its motion picture feature of chief interest for the week of January 27, Triangle has listed "Her American Husband," which it announces as a reversal of the story and play, "Madame Butterfly." Intermarriage betwen the white and yellow races is the theme, and Triangle claims it is timely enough to draw more than usual attention.

Darrell Foss, in "Her American Husband," is cast as the profligate young millionaire, and Teddy Sampson has the part of Cherry Blossom, a Japanese girl. The picture was directed by E. Mason Hopper.

Texas Guinan will make her next appearance on the screen the latter part of the same week in "The Gun Woman," in which she is cast as the proprietress of a saloon and dance hall in the early west. She becomes the victim of a bandit's duplicity, and it is then that the Bostonian, a Wells Fargo detective working incognito on his trail, wins her love and confidence. How the call of love comes into the sordid life of an apparently evil woman, is shown in this drama of a woman's regeneration.

Edwin Brady, the Bostonian, has appeared in "Wild Sumac" and "Indiscreet Corinne." Francis McDonald, who played in Alma Ruebens support in "I Love You," departs from the conventional tricks of the heavy and has the part of the highwayman. Frank Borzago is credited with the direction of this production.

The Keystone comedy, "Ruined by a Dumbwaiter," is also to be released for the week of January 27, and there's said to be a climax in it that kicks cords of chortles and roars of riotous laughter from funproof fiends and the observer has just strength enough left to get home and tell the folks.

"A Butler Bust Up" and "Too Many Husbands" are one-reel Triangle Komedies included in the week's release.

Miss Phillips' Features Independent

Although they will continue to be released through Bluebird exchanges, photoplays in which Dorothy Phillips stars will, hereafter, be special atractions, to be designated as "Dorothy Phillips Productions." There will be no brand designation, and the method of handling the pictures will apply as though they were independent productions without being any part of the regular Bluebird program.

"The Grand Passion," lately introduced to the screen for the first time at the Broadway theatre, New York, will be the initial "Dorothy Phillips Production" to reach exhibitors under the new plan.

Help Is Short in Omaha

The fifteen Omaha, Neb., exchanges report difficulty in getting help. "I take whatever comes along, no matter whether the applicant has had experience or not," said one manager. Others complain of an underhanded campaign to steal their employes by the offer of a higher salary. The managers say the salaries being paid exchange employes are now higher than they have ever been. Stenographers are worst needed.

News Reels and Conversation

Writer Figures That Majority of Audience Is Feminine, and Declares Something to Make Them Talk Is What Is Needed

ONE thing you, Mr. Exhibitor, want above everything else is to send your patrons away talking about the pictures, and so interested that they will continue to discuss them at the family dinner table, at the next lunch hour, at the knitting bee. Especially at the knitting bee. For seventy-five per cent of your house is feminine, and it is the women, with their greater leisure, who come back matinee after matinee, lured by the memory of what they or their friends have enjoyed at your theatre.

Have you considered the Screen Magazine as a topic of conversation? Perhaps you are not familiar with it—confuse it, as a matter of fact, with the news reel. Except that its subjects are of more or less timely interest, it resembles a news reel only as "Every Week," for instance, resembles the front page of the daily paper. It has from three to five subjects only, one of them usually a cartoon or other humorous element, and the subjects are such as appeal by their intimate interest or novel and picturesque character to every man, woman, and child. Here, for example, are some of the topics treated

F. Leventhal, which are in a class by themselves. The screen magazines to which we refer are the Paramount-Bray Pictograph, the Universal Screen Magazine, and the Argus Pictorial, released by the Pathe Exchange. Each differs in character as good magazines differ, yet each is eminently suited to add that element of pleasing novelty desired by the careful exhibitor.

"Punch" and "thrill" are all very well, and to an extent necessary. The drawing power of the star will remain as long as the power of personality intrigues curiosity. But unrelieved by the wholesome flavor of every-day life these romantic elements tend to pall and become stale. Add to the enthralling feature and the laugh-provoking comedy the screen magazine. It will enhance the interest of your other films by contrast, it will offer in itself just that element needed to make the whole program humanly real; it will, more than any other part of the program, remain in the memory of the spectators and reappear in their daily talk. "Our best people" use it and like it. Can you afford to be anything else than the best?

Pictographs Show Women in War Work

A series on "Women In the World of Work" is announced by the Bray Studios, Inc., as a part of the Paramount-Bray Pictograph, the "magazine of the screen." The first issue is scheduled to appear in the 103rd release, for which Anne Haviland, who distills perfume from flowers, furnished the story.

This series will run over a period of weeks, and each installment will be a complete story in itself.

Zeppelins Shown In Animated Weekly

In the Universal Animated Weekly No. 7, two monster Zeppelins are shown, according to announcement this week from Jack Cohn's Universal office. One of these German air machines is shown as a skeleton, and the other is shown complete in detail.

Other features of Universal Animated Weekly No. 7 include interesting pictures of the construction of wooden ships at Houston, Texas.

War Pictures Half of Mutual Weekly

News pictures from Europe made up a half of No. 4 of the Gaumont-Mutual Weekly, which was released on Sunday, January 20. Photographs are shown of the new French Cabinet, headed by M. George Clemenceau, Premier and Minister of War, and of the Allied War Conference, composed of special ambassadors of the Allies which met in Paris to establish a better unity of control in the conduct of the war.

War Scenes Stand High with Public

Jack Cohn, of Universal Current Events and the Universal Animated Weekly, claims that from a survey he has caused to be made the result justifies his declaration that of all war pictures from the various fronts there is no series holding higher place in the estimation of the public than those of the Current Events and Animated Weekly.

WHAT THE NEWS WEEKLIES OFFER

Hearst-Pathe News No. 6 is an especially good number, giving much space to fine pictures taken in Arabia, where the nomads of the desert are rallying to the cause of the Allies and democracy. A mass of men storming a rugged height is particularly effective, while the camel trains that convey the wounded to a dressing station are an odd contrast to our smoothly moving motor ambulances.

Pasadena's Rose Festival furnishes a number of floats whose warlike character is veiled in the floral wealth that decks them. The white linen costumes of the Red Cross women who march in the procession is a token of sunny skies and warm weather in that happy land.

Unusual close-ups of the production of oil at Lake Charles, La., give an idea of the character of the crude product and the means taken to render it sufficiently liquid to flow through the pipe lines.

The two weeklies issued by the Universal Company maintain their lively and interesting character. Space is given to the Arabian scenes and the Pasadena Festival, but exclusive features are offered by Current Events No. 36 in a fire scene on the Pacific Coast, theatrical in its catastrophe, in an exciting horse race at New Orleans, and in pictures of the Alaskan "huskies" now pulling sledges to save the wounded in the snows of the Vosges Mountains.

Animated Weekly No. 7 starts off with iceboating on the Shrewsbury, and shows us, in a number of striking scenes, just what Chicago is struggling with in her shroud of snow. An exclusive feature of great interest is the giant Zeppelin recently brought down by French aviators after it had made a "successful raid" on helpless London. Comely young ladies from the cast of "Flo Flo" exhibit the latest in gorgeous and extravagant apparel.

With a view, doubtless, of varying the monotony of the local snow and ice, Mutual Weekly No. 3W1 embraces scenes ranging from frozen Boston Harbor to the Arabian desert. En route the camera stops at the Biltmore Roof, where young ladies of marvelous agility display the latest wringles in skating and skating costumes; and at Hoboken and Junction City, Kansas, victims both of destructive fires. At Pasadena it records the procession of the Tournament of Roses, and in Eureka, California, pictures a theatre which by charging a carrot or a potato instead of the usual admission added materially to the food supply of the needy.

The desert pictures have to do with the departure of French troops from Suez and their arrival at El Ouedz and the Oasis of Gidda. They are novel and pleasing.

WEST POINT—CONCENTRATED

What our young men have gone through and survived to win the coveted commission is shown in very interesting fashion in a current release of the Educational Films Corporation, "The Making of an American Officer." The picture, one reel in length, was taken at the Plattsburg Training Camp and covers the entire day of the student lieutenant from reveille at 5.30 to dress parade.

Breakfast over, the boys wash dishes, survey and lay out a trench, building up its walls with "revetments" of sandbags and branches, study and practise the principles of engineering, lay and destroy barbed wire, improve their marksmanship with rifle and big gun, and exhibit their skill in birch tree camouflage.

With a subject of such interest to all Americans, the reel should prove exceedingly popular.

A PUSSY AND A PARROT TIME

The monkey wasn't there. Probably that is why in "Animal Drolleries" (Educational Films Corporation) the cat and the parrot chum together so lovingly. Not so happy, however, is pussy when introduced to a coiled snake. Mr. Snake was dead, but Puss didn't know that and went after him very gingerly with a gentle tap of the paw and a quick recover. But courage rises with lack of opposition and Puss exhibits a real temper and fighting spirit.

A ferret with her young, and an otter that does his best—and worst—to take a bath in a washbasin, are other actors in this very amusing reel.

BIRDS THAT FOLLOW THE SEA

Aquatic birds in their native habitat are the subjects of "Birdland Studies" (Educational Films Corporation). Snapshots of the diver, the crested crevy and young birds on their nests are followed by a number of extensive views and close-ups of cormorants and puffins as they gather in great swarms on the rocks or alight on the surf.

Short Subjects in Review

By Clara DeLissa Berg

Grand Canyon in Scenic from General

The current Essanay scenic released through General Film Company is entitled "The Two Biggest Things in the World—The Grand Canyon of Arizona and Canyon DeChelly." It is said to be an ideal short-length subject for any program.

QUAINT FRANCE

Here is a story whose truth is vouched for. A soldier of Brittany standing at attention was addressed by his officer. The man failed to respond even when the question was repeated and the man's knowledge of his supposedly native tongue sarcastically questioned. A German prisoner happened to be standing near and saw the incident. "Pardon, sir," said he to the officer, "but this man is from Brittany; he does not speak French."

The remoteness of this corner of France is well illustrated in Pathe's "Picturesque Brittany," a half-reel in color, to which is added, also in color, "Bonnets of Brittany." The neat farms, old courtyards with their ancient and beautiful wells, the lovely wooded ravines and the odd costumes and headgear form a series of charming pictures not without humor. The "bonnets" are of lace or fine lawn, varying from a tiny cap with a "ticker tape" appendage that flies in the wind to a dressy confection resembling a frosted wedding cake.

WHEN EVEN SCIENCE CHARMS

Argus Pictorial No. 6 (Pathe Exchange) continues its pleasing task of showing the attractive side of scientific cracksmanship. The first half of the reel is devoted to those clever artisans of the American Museum of Natural History who devise delicate models of insect, plant and animal life from blown and spun glass, wax, plaster, celluloid and paint. "Four o'clocks," sea lettuce, starfish and a horny crab are presented in process of creation.

A short length of film on that queer creature, the sea horse, who looks like a Greek fable come to life, follows the above and is accompanied by pictures of the Stentor, a microscopic fraction of an inch long in real life, but very imposing and formidable on the screen.

The principles of physical Adhesion and Cohesion, so common in our daily life that we fail to consider them, are illustrated by a number of simple and easily understood experiments.

"THE HOUND OF THE HILLS"

"Once there was a dog who grew too big for his kennel," says Robert T. Bruce in introducing us to this, the latest and one of the most beautiful of his scenic pictures, released by the Educational Films Corporation. So he shows us his famous Dane setting off for adventure in the high hills. Lying with nose almost touching the water, the dog watches the trout that sport in the still pool. He has his "meatless Tuesdays" six days a week, when the ptarmigan prove elusive. Through the fragrant pine forests he takes his way, and up where rough ice is the only pathway. A motionless figure of bronze, he watches the sun drop behind the silent hills.

None can see this picture without a throb of response to the majesty of the great brute matching his strength against the strength and splendor of nature.

THE LADY OF THE PERFUMES

Not all the women are driving ambulances or taking the place of men at counter and desk. A few continue to pursue the professions they have created by dint of initiative, courage and hard work, and to preserve in the midst of the mighty material struggle some of the charm and beauty of life. In Paramount-Bray Pictograph No. 102 we meet one such, Anne Haviland, a girl from Maryland's eastern shore, who in her own laboratory distils perfumes equal to the finest essences that used to come from abroad. The pictures of her at work among the flowers, aided by a real "mammy" in a bandanna, are notably artistic and pleasing.

Birds are playing a prominent part in this week's short subjects, and the Bray Studios contribute some good snapshots taken on Pelican Island, the Federal bird reservation in Florida. The poor little plucked nestlings just out of the egg are a sorry sight, but under the care of the parents, who fly to a distance of fifteen miles to procure food for them, they soon develop into lively youngsters able to take care of themselves.

Bobby Bumps's experiments with a home-made disappearing gun are more notable for their ingenuity than their success.

ILLUSTRATING THE ABOVE

A comfort in the dark hour that comes to us all when we picture the agony of the battlefield is a knowledge of the training given the Red Cross ambulance aides in lifting and caring for the wounded (Universal Screen Magazine No. 56). The variety of ways in which a helpless man may be carried so as to avoid giving unnecessary pain to injured members is almost as surprising as the rapidity and skill with which the aides put them into practice.

This is one of two serious subjects in this excellent issue of the Magazine. The other deals with the timely topic of wooden ship building and shows the curving hulls from the inside, views fore and aft, the driving of both metal and wooden spikes, and the launching of the completed vessel.

In lighter vein are "Punch and Judy Land," taken behind the scenes of the Marionette theatre in Greenwich Village, this city, and the making of the artificial food that is used by the Food Conservation Committee in its publicity campaign. A Japanese weed furnishes the material out of which the American Museum of Natural History fashions its object lessons, but so skillful are the craftsmen that, as all of us know who have chanced on this bit of Uncle Sam's advertising, the luscious sirloin and succulent bean are warranted to deceive at a distance of a dozen feet.

Gerard's Screen Version Ready

"My Four Years in Germany," By James W. Gerard, Now Being Cut and Edited by Director Nigh—Facts Revealed

"My Four Years in Germany, Inc.," adapted from Ambassador James W. Gerard's book of the same name, has been completed by Director William Nigh, it is announced.

The picture is said to be big as a theatrical production, and a rare example of the possibilities of a picture in reproducing history in the making.

An official of the company said:

"Few diplomats have been so priviledged during the last few years as Mr. Gerard, and none has borne himself with greater credit. As long as history shall be written, Sir Edward Goschen's narrative of his last interview with the German Chancellor, the famous 'scrap of paper' incident, will be quoted. Mr. Gerard was given the opportunity during four years to see Germany from within, and in particular to watch an autocratic and efficient military machine at work during over two years of war. His ambassadorship is memorable in two ways: First, it was made the occasion for a display of clumsiness, haughtiness and suspicion on the part of Germany towards the representative of a powerful neutral country and secondly

"Mr. Gerard's term is memorable because of his printed record of it. Seldom before has an ambassador published his reminiscences immediately upon his retirement. But a new occasion called for a new precedent. The world wanted an image of German life, a picture of what was felt to be the twisted psychology of the German mind. Mr. Gerard was one of the few men able to give this, and his book 'My Four Years in Germany' has become one of the most important diplomatic disclosures published during any war.

"To quote the author's words it was 'written because I want to bring home to our people the gravity of the situation.'

"It has become a striking historical document, a plain record that none can misunderstand of the madness of a people drunk with autocracy, and, incidentally, a revelation of a cool sagacious ambassador who was equal to the many demands which an unexempled situation made upon intellect and character."

Mr. Nigh is now cutting the picture. It will be shown first in Washington before the United States officials.

Arrow Film to Handle Warren Productions

EDWARD WARREN, Edward Warren Productions, announces that he has concluded a contract with the Arrow Film Corporation whereby that company takes over the marketing of all Warren productions, including future productions, as well. Mr. Warren in making the announcement, said:

"I have spent one year in observation and investigation, and in some measure in experimenting with marketing methods. Of course, we producers have done little else in the last three months but mark time, but the experience has been peculiarly valuable to me in that the conditions which have obtained in the picture industry have given us the first real chance we have ever had to see the seamy side of the business and its constituent parts. If weakness has existed anywhere it has been disclosed in the confusion of recent months.

"I am an optimist, have always been one, and have never for one minute doubted the future of the picture business; and the most hopeful note in the varied chorus of pessimism that has been dinning in our ears lately is the firm tone of the substantial men in the industry. And there are a lot of them—but the organization headed by W. E. Shallenberger and Robert W. Priest has made an especially strong appeal to me both because of the character of the organization and the far-sighted policy of distribution under which they operate. I have found Arrow Film Corporation's connections the very best and their standing excellent. So thoroughly convinced am I of their sincerity and definiteness of purpose that I have turned over to them both my negatives, "Souls Redeemed" and "Weavers of Life."

"There is some unsold territory on the first picture that will be offered by Arrow Film Corporation, while selling work on my new picture has really not yet been started. Nathan Gordon bought New England rights, Mr. Franklin Backer has bought New York State and northern New Jersey, and the African Film Trust has taken the South African territory. The rest of the world is in the hands of Arrow Film Corporation. I have also concluded an arrangement with them whereby they will handle my future productions."

You are not going to war. The men who are need all the comforts you can give them. Help them get cigarettes. That is your patriotic duty. If you aren't helping in the "smokes" campaign, get busy—now. Don't be a slacker!

W. H. Productions' Comedies Released February 1st

W. H. Productions Company announce that the twenty-eight two-reel Mack Sennett produced comedies, including three Chaplins, will be released commencing February 1, at the rate of one a week.

The first six subjects have already been prepared. They are: "A Small Town Bully," with Mabel Normand, Mack Sennett, Roscoe Arbuckle, and Owen Moore; "Friendly Enemies," with Syd Chaplin and Chester Conklin; "A Polished Villain," with Al. St. John, Charles Arling and Mae Bush; "His Diving Beauty," with Mabel Normand, Roscoe Arbuckle and Mack Swain; "His Bitter Half," with Polly Moran and Charles Murray; "The Dynamiter," with Chester Conklin. The advertising matter on each one of these productions will consist of a lobby display of 8 x 10 and 11 x 14 photographs, three and six sheet posters and special novelty heralds. Information received from a number of the Exchanges that have already acquired the territory for these productions, is to the effect that exhibitors throughout the country are waiting for the entire series, and it is expected that these comedies will go over big.

Wohlfarth and Westfall Form Atlantic Film

Martin Wohlfarth and A. E. Westfall, prominent New Jersey exhibitors and salesmen, announce that they have established the Atlantic Film Company, with offices in the Leavitt Building, 126 West Forty-sixth street, New York, and will exploit productions on the independent market in the New Jersey territory. Mr. Wohlfarth is the owner of the Atlantic theatre, Spring Lake, N. J., and Mr. Westfall is well-known salesman in the New Jersey territory. Their first offering is "Mother," the McClure picture produced under the direction of George Loane Tucker, with Elisabeth Risdon in the featured role.

First Two Jester Comedies Exploited

William Steiner, Jester Comedy Company, left last week for an extended trip through the country, in the interest of the "show you" policy inaugurated by the company recently. He will show to the trade of the various cities which he will visit, the first two-part Jester Comedies, featuring Twede-Dan, the "International mirth maker." The comedies are titled, "The Recruit," and "His Golden Romance." The Arrow Film Corporation, sales representatives, Shallenberger and Priest, have bought the foreign rights to these comedies.

New England Gives "The Belgian" Welcome

U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation's feature, "The Belgian," produced by Sidney Olcott, attracted a gathering of more than 400 exhibitors and buyers of New England when this feature was shown by A. Lincoln Ehrgott, the booking company's representative in the New England district, with headquarters in the Globe Feature Film Corporation, 20 Winchester street, in Boston, last week. Optimistic reports concerning conditions in that territory have been resumed by Lynn S. Card, general sales manager of the booking corporation. He said:

"Despite the recent depression that reached its lowest ebb around the holidays there has come a big improvement in local conditions, and I anticipate a big volume of business on "The Belgian." New England exhibitors are becoming more optimistic.

Thomas Kelly Becomes Wolfberg Representative

Thomas P. Kelly, formerly connected with Pathe, Paramount and Artcraft sales forces, is now a member of the Harris P. Wolfberg Attractions, Pittsburgh, it is announced. Mr. Kelly will be Harris P. Wolfberg Attractions' Pennsylvania representative. For the past several months Mr. Kelly has been located in Detroit. He is well known in the Pennsylvania territory and will devote his activities to work in the Northwestern section of that State.

Mr. Kelly said:

"I am convinced that the principle behind the Wolfberg exchanges is several seasons in advance of the game. I think in a short time the entire industry will be working along the same line. I notice the recent Metro appeal to exhibitors to choose pictures independently and I think the big field in the future is the independent field."

Barbara Castleton in Brenon Film

In addition to Bert Lytell, who plays the stellar role, and William E. Shay as Wertheimer, a number of players have been added to the cast of Herbert Brenon's production of "False Faces," or the sequel to "The Lone Wolf," now being filmed at the Brenon Studios on Hudson Heights.

Barbara Castleton heads the list as Cecelia Brooke, the leading feminine role.

Alfred Hickman, who has taken prominent roles in a number of Brenon pictures, will be seen again as Eckstrom, which character he created in the film adaptation of "The Lone Wolf." W. L. Abingdon is also a prominent member of the cast, while others who will be seen are Earle Brunswick, Henry Koser, Logan Paul, Franklin Murray and Joseph Scott.

Film Stars Seen in "The Crucible of Life"

"The Crucible of Life," the latest seven-part war drama which General Enterprises, Inc., are offering for State right distribution, is an adaptation of Bartley Campbell's famous melodrama of "Fairfax," a country-wide legitimate success for many years. Messrs. Sawyer and Lubin have succeeded in securing the original stage Fairfax in the person of Frank O'Connor for the same role in the film version. Mr. O'Connor portrayed this particular part for many years. Featured in the leading female role is Grace D'Armond, at present featured by Vitagraph. Miss D'Armond will be remembered for her appearance in the Technicolor production, "The Gulf Between." Jack Sherrill has the juvenile role. Mr. Sherrill's last work was in "The Witching Hour" and "God's Man." Edwin Vosburgh has the heavy role.

The feature has been booked for a Broadway run at the Park theatre and will open at that house on January 27.

Brenon Plans for Current Year

Herbert Brenon, Who Has Established Himself and Company in Independent Field, Announces Plans for Year

HERBERT BRENON in announcing his plans for the current year paves the way for even a more successful year than he as a director and independent producer experienced the past year. During the past year Mr. Brenon established himself as one of the most successful independent producers in the market. He first secured complete control of the corporation bearing his name and acquired all other interests. Next, he purchased the fully equipped studios and laboratories at Hudson Heights, N. J., which he had been occupying since their construction. He then established his own distribution organization, with offices at No. 509 Fifth avenue, New York City.

This perfected his "director-to-exhibitor" plan. It gave him absolute control of a production, from the selection of the script and player to the time the finished product reached the exhibitor. It permits him to make a production and send it to the public exactly as he believes it should go.

Following the establishment of this independent concern, Mr. Brenon announced his plans for the present year. He has just completed Rupert Hughes's melodrama of New York life, "Empty Pockets." He then produced Jerome K. Jerome's "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," with Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson in his beloved role of the Stranger. He announces as forthcoming productions, Hall Caine's famous novel, "The Woman Thou Gavest Me," and Edward Knoblock's fanciful romance of old Bagdad, "Kismet." In the latter, Otis Skinner will make his first appearance as an exponent of the silent drama.

Another forthcoming production will be "The False Faces," Louis Joseph Vance's continuation of the adventures of "The Lone Wolf," which has been running in the Saturday Evening Post. Bert Lytell, who scored in "The Lone Wolf" will reappear in the leading role. All these plans are being faithfully carried out.

The distribution of "Empty Pockets" is being handled by the First National Exhibitors' Circuit. The cast includes Bert Lytell, Malcolm Williams, Barbara Castleton, Mlle. Ketty Galanta, Peggy Betts and Susan Willa.

"The Passing of the Third Floor Back" is practically completed. Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson is supported by George Le Guere, Molly Pearson, Mlle. Galanta, Alfred Hickman, Ricca Allen, Ben Graham and Sydney Golden in the principal roles. This production will be presented to the public in the very near future.

Mr. Brenon will personally direct every production, making four or five photoplays in the course of a year. The Brenon plant is one of the most thoroughly equipped studios in the East. There are two large and model studio buildings, laboratories, administration building and garage. Both the studios and laboratories have every modern and up-to-date appliance for the taking of film.

The Brenon Distributing Corporation is now handling the territory of New York State and Northern New Jersey. S. J. Berman, one of the best known exchange managers in this field of motion pictures, is sales manager for the distributing organization.

"I realize more fully today than ever before, and I think, every manufacturer should realize it now, if he hasn't before, that unless the exhibitor gets a square deal, the entire motion picture industry must collapse," he said. "Huge intermediate profits must cease. In making pictures, it will always be my policy to keep in close touch with the man who shows the picture to the public. The exhibitor cannot be fooled by flamboyant advertising. He is going to look at his box-office statement and nothing else."

First Jester Comedies Featuring Twede-Dan

TWO comedies of two reels each are ready for release by the Jester Comedy Company. This company has entered the producing field only recently. It is said by those who have seen the first two comedy releases, that they contain a comedy punch in every scene. Twede-Dan, known as the International mirth maker, is the featured comedian.

Recently a private showing to a number of out-of-town buyers was given and they pronounced them to be good, live comedies. It is announced that the exclusive rights to two years' output of these comedies were secured by several of the buyers for their territory. The names of the buyers have not been announced.

The Jester Company will release one two-reel comedy every month, the first released on the 15th of February and titled "The Recruit," to be followed by "His Golden Romance," "All 'Fur' Her" and "In and Out." The Jester Comedies are offered on a straight out-and-out booking system. Mr. Steiner said:

"So strong is my confidence in the quality of the comedies to be offered that I have inaugurated a 'show you' policy before buying or booking in order that each exhibitor can see for himself exactly what is coming and has the right of refusal if it does not meet with his approval. It is not the intention of the Jester Comedy Company to force by contract the use of Jester Comedies on exhibitors. Jester Comedies will be offered on a straight out-and-out open booking system.

"Twede-Dan, the featured comedian, possesses all the elements demanded by an exacting public and a range of characterizations that are almost limitless. I predict that he will rank as one of the foremost comedians ever presented to the motion picture public."

Jean Sothern, Who Is Starring in "Peg o' the Sea"

Jean Sothern Feature Given Good Reception

Sterling Pictures Corporation announce the sale of their State right feature, "Peg o' the Sea," starring Jean Sothern, for more than fifty per cent of the entire United States in the past ten days. Herbert R. Ebenstein, manager of sales for Sterling Pictures Corporation is now en route on a selling trip to Detroit, Chicago, Memphis, Kansas City and St. Louis. He announces a big demand for features that can be rented at reasonable prices and finds an enthusiastic reception for the "Sterling System."

Stevens Gets Rights to Hall Films

Charles Stevens, president of the Superfeatures, Ltd., one of the largest of the Canadian independent distributing concerns, has returned to his home in Toronto after having obtained from Frank Hall, president of the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation, the franchise for the Canadian distributing privileges to all subjects released by his organization.

Mr. Stevens has already established offices in Montreal and Toronto and another at St. John, through which the Maritime provinces are covered. J. C. Crosby is in charge of the Toronto exchange, L. M. Kissock is head of the Montreal offices and M. J. Brown handles the bookings in the maritime exchange.

Inter-Ocean Film Reports Successful Sales

M. S. Epstin, travelling representative of the Cinema Distributing Corporation, who has returned from Chicago, reports the sale of "The 13th Labor of Hercules, the twelve-reel series of the Panama-Pacific Exposition, to Celebrated Players Film Company of Chicago for Illinois.

The Inter-Ocean Film Corporation reports the sale of "Enlighten Thy Daughter" through their Paris office for the following territory: France, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, Egypt, Spain, Portugal, Greece, the Balkan countries and their colonies.

Juggling a Clock Is But One Incident in "Mickey," Starring Mabel Normand. H. Winik, of the Western Import Company, Which Controls the Feature, Is Shown on the Right

"Mickey" To Have City Run

Western Import Company Promise Early Showing—Mabel Normand Is Said To Do Her Best In This Picture

WESTERN IMPORT COMPANY announces that its special feature, "Mickey," featuring Mabel Normand, will, if present plans materialize, be given a Broadway showing soon. The announcement says:

"In the showing of 'Mickey' will be demonstrated the fact that it is possible to produce a picture that can go into a theatre and remain successfully for an indefinite period of time, the same as a big successful legitimate show.

"'Mickey' is different from any other production, and will stand by itself for a long time to come. It runs the gaunlet of every human emotion, and although Mabel Normand will appear in other productions, she will never be able to come up to the standard established in 'Mickey,' because her success in this production is attributed not only to her own personality and genius, but the happy medium of the combination of Miss Normand, that master of comedy directors, Mack Sennett, the wonderful story, the perfect cast and the general harmonious conditions prevailing in the production of 'Mickey.'

"The story of 'Mickey' did not call for artificiality and it was not necessary for Mack Sennett to resort to any form of 'camouflage,' because he was capable of bringing out the richness of the soul and heart and the character of the little girl character in the most natural way: by keeping her in rags in a number of the scenes, so that the personality of Mabel Normand shone more brightly. Although 'Mickey' travels the road from poverty to riches, and is dressed up in some of the scenes in riches and the finest of jewelry, she does her best work and shows her real personality while dressed in rags.

"It is a known fact in the trade that when a director lacks imagination or has a poor story, that he resorts to the superficial in order to try and put his picture over. This is true of a great number of the productions in which prominent stars appear and which are produced by prominent directors; but this has been entirely eliminated from the story of 'Mickey,' which has perfect continuity, a human story and a strong cast."

Sawyer and Lubin Exploiting "Mother"

Arthur H. Sawyer and Herbert Lubin of General Enterprises, Inc., left New York Monday, for Boston, in the interests of their State right feature, "Mother." They will arrange to obtain a first run booking for the George Loane Tucker production starring Elizabeth Risdon, at one of Boston's large photoplay houses. After the run of "Mother" has established it as a box office attraction they plan to dispose of the New England territory to one of the leading buyers.

During their stay in Boston the two State right distributors also expect to attend several meetings held for the purpose of discussing the recent orders of the Massachusetts Fuel Administration, whereby the New England theatres must operate between the hours of seven and ten. Messrs. Sawyer and Lubin have prepared several convincing articles which they expect to place before the local Fuel Administrators and plans have been made to secure the co-operation of the leading exhibitors and State right buyers in Boston.

They will return to New York in time for the special presentation to be given the latest feature offering, "The Crucible of Life," the seven-part war drama starring Grace D'Armond and Jack Sherill.

Omaha Exchangeman Talks Optimism

Manager Blakeman of the Triangle exchange in Omaha, Neb., has a high word of praise for the exhibitors of Sioux City, Ia. "They are always happy," said he. "I never saw such a bunch of optimists. Every one of them who comes into my office has a new line of cheer to offer. Business is always good, or at least the prospects for good business are always splendid, when they are doing the talking. And every exhibitor in the city is making money, too, so far as I can find out."

Keeney Pictures Leases Biograph Studios

Frank A. Keeney, Frank A. Keeney Pictures Corporation, announces that he has leased the Biograph Studios for the first Keeney production featuring Catherine Calvert. The Biograph Studios will be used by the Keeney Corporation until its new studio, the plans for which are being made by an architect, is erected. The new studio will be located on a site near the company's executive headquarters, Broadway and Forty-third street, it is announced.

Miss Calvert's first picture is titled "The Girl Who Saw Life." The story was written by Benjamin Kutler, formerly editor for Augustus Thomas and Popular Plays and Players. Mr. Kutler is author of many screen successes. James Kirkwood who has been engaged to direct Keeney productions is now assembling the cast, and it is intended that the first production will be under way by February 1.

The story tells of the dramatic incidents in the life of a young girl, who, by the turn of fortune, is thrown, without resources, onto the world. It is said to touch a tragic note and yet contain some fine comedy.

U. S. Exhibitors' Product for South America

Notwithstanding reports of slack business, in the foreign field, Miss Edna Williams, special representative of the Robertson-Cole Company, of New York and London, to which the foreign territorial rights to the productions released by the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation have been allotted, reports unusual success with his product in South America.

Within a period of three weeks Miss Williams has disposed of all the South American rights to the U. E. subjects, including "The Zeppelin's Last Raid," "Those Who Pay" and the Sidney Olcott drama, "The Belgian," in which Walker Whiteside and Valentine Grant are featured. The most recent transaction is the disposal of the rights to all three of the aforementioned subjects for Paraguay, Uraguay and Argentine.

In and Out of West Coast Studios

By J. C. Jessen

PRIOR to his departure for the East, after a stay of almost three weeks in Los Angeles, J. A. Berst, general manager for Pathe, gave a dinner to a number of principals of the Pathe producing staff at the Los Angeles Athletic Club, when covers for twenty-two were laid. A Hungarian orchestra furnished music throughout the evening, and it proved a most pleasant event. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Bryant Washburn, Mr. and Mrs. W. A. S. Douglas, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Cunningham, Mr. and Mrs. Leon T. Osborne, Toto, Harold Lloyd, Bebe Daniels, Gertrude Selby and George A. Smith.

Passing of Slap-Stick

Bulletin board orders at the Triangle Culver City studios, indicate the passing of slap-stick incidents, eccentric and extraordinary characters in Keystone comedies, for the instructions now before the writers of the comedy department, which is under the direction of Albert Glassmire, provide that all stories for the future must depend upon situations and complications for their fun, and there must be no incidents which in production are referred to as gags.

This will cause a complete change in comedy making at this plant, for in many of the comedies made heretofore, the outlandish make-ups and gags have been used to create the mirth about a purely melodramatic plot. The writers of the department have, to a more or less degree, specialized in the creation of such comedy scenarios, and now it will be necessary for them to create situations that are of laugh-making character. What applies to the writers, applies as well to the directors and to a more or less extent, upon the players themselves. The instructions became effective at once, and so the passing of the old Keystone in the newer releases, can be expected within the next six weeks.

The dramatic scenario department will probably have a big change, as the result of the resignation of Frank J. Beresford, who has served as editor of the department for a number of months, which became effective this week. Jack Cunningham, who has been continuity writer, and prior to that time served as editor of the department, has also tendered his resignation, and will accept a position with the Western Pathe organization. Successor has not been named for either of these parties.

Fox Makes Three

Three subjects are in production at the William Fox studios, and one has just been completed by Bertram Bracken. At the studio much is to be expected of the forthcoming Tom Mix picture now being made by S. A. Franklin as director. The plot for the story is said to be based on a heretofore unprinted or unscreened story of actual history in California. Mix takes the role of the hero, a romantic and vivid type. Enid Markey plays opposite Mix, and is the big sister of eight youngsters who are taken by the Fox kiddies, the list including Georgie Stone, Lewis Sargent, Buddie Messinger, Raymond Lee, Virginia Lee Corbin, Violet Radcliffe, Marie Messinger, Beulah Burns and Vivian Planck. Others in this cast are Sam deGrasse, Charles Stevens, Pat Christmas and Jack Planck.

C. A. Franklin and company, headed by Jewel Carmen are still in the mountain country, securing scenes for the unnamed photoplay in which Miss Carmen appears as the city woman who revels in life in the wild section of California, following a very unpleasant life in the city. The company has been in the vicinity of Bear Lake Valley for the past two weeks.

Frank Lloyd continues on the divorce photoplay. That is, the story deals with the present method of divorce of this country. Bertha Mann, who was drafted from the speaking stage stock company at the Morosco theatre, Los Angeles, is making her first appearance in this subject, and is fulfilling all expectations. Charles Clary, well known in Selig, Fine Art and Fox subjects, is playing the leading man role.

Bertram Bracken has just finished the filming of a dual role photoplay starring Gladys Brockwell, and is now at work with the scenario writers preparing his next production. Colin Chase, Bertram Grassby, Joseph Singleton, Rosita Marstini, Cora Drew and Nancy Caswell are principals of the Bracken-Brockwell play.

Metro Undergoes Change

The Metro scenario department has undergone a complete change. William Parker and H. P. Keeler, who were formerly there, have both resigned. The new staff includes Albert Levine, formerly with the Sixty-first street Metro studio staff in New York; Frederick Osman, late of Lasky scenario department, and H. Lewis Synder.

Two Metro subjects will shortly be ready for shipment east. B. A. Ralfe, studios manager, is now supervising the editing of these with the directors. Tod Browning has "Revenge," the Edith Storey subject, completed, and the other in the process of cutting is "The Weaver of Dreams."

Frank Reicher, who recently arrived from the east, is now directing the production of "The Claim," which was written by Charles Kenyon and Frank Dare. Besides Edith Sorey, Mignon Anderson and M. J. Malatesta take leading parts.

The other Metro Company is under the direction of Charles Brabin, and is filming "Breakers Ahead," an original story by Brabin and H. P. Keeler. Clifford Bruce is the leading man of this subject, Mabel Van Buren has been especially engaged for an important part, and Viola Dana takes the featured lead. There will be a number of special sets for this subject, together with marine scenes of a highly melodramatic nature. The script provides for the burning of a ship at night, and a big set will be built along the seashore. In an explosion scene, it is estimated that more than one thousand dollars worth of explosives will be required.

Dalton Feature Named

"Tyrant Fear" is the title given the R. Cecil Smith story now being filmed under the direction of R. William Neill with Dorothy Dalton as star. This will be a Thomas H. Ince-Paramount release in May or June. Many of the scenes for this are laid in Alaska, and the Dalton-Neill Company spent the past week in snow climate of Mount Wilson. "Tyrant Fear" is spoken of as a Canadian northwest story, similar to the "Flame of the Yukon," and will serve to introduce Carmen Phillips under the Ince banner.

C. Gardner Sullivan is now devoting practically all of his time to the preparation of the next William S. Hart Artcraft. Hart is now engaged in filming a story by J. G. Hawks, which has been given the temporary title of "Bad Buck." Mr. Sullivan, it will be remembered, is the author of "The Aryan," "Hell's Hinges," and a number of other subjects in which Hart was starred.

The Thomas H. Ince payroll now contains three Bennetts instead of two, the result of Marguerite, the sister of Enid and Marjorie, paying a visit to the studio to see her sisters earn their salaries, and making good when given a test. Marguerite and mother of the Bennett sisters, together with a small brother, arrived in Los Angeles during the past week from Australia.

Lasky Visit Delayed

Information received this week at the Lasky studio brought notice of the delay of Jesse L. Lasky to the coast. He was expected to arrive not later than the twelfth, but now his visit has been postponed until in February. In the meantime a number of changes have been made with respect to production.

"The Honor of His House" has been adapted for the screen by Marion Fairfax, and production has been started by William C. deMille. Sessue Hayakawa is the featured player, and will have as supports Florence Vidor, Jack Holt and Clarence Geldert. Mr. deMille has just completed filming an adaptation from his own stage play which was known as "The Land of the Free." The screen version was written by Olga Printzlau, and the finished subject, which stars George Beban, has been titled "One More American." A particularly large cast played in support of Beban, who has another Italian characterization in this photoplay, the list including Marcia Mannon, Raymond Hatton, Helen Eddy, Jack Holt, and Horace B. Carpenter.

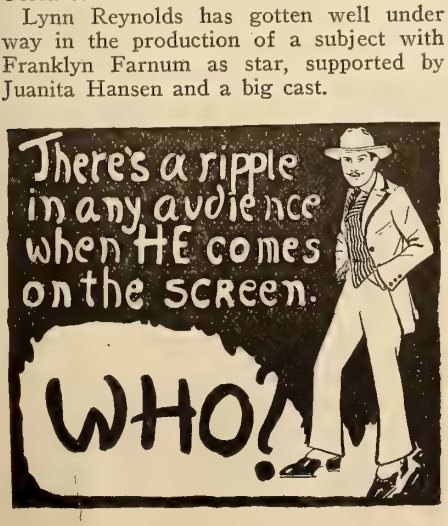
Marshall Neilan has completed the filming of the Mary Pickford subject "Amarilly of Clothesline Alley," and inasmuch as the screen rights for "Daddy Long-Legs" could not be secured from the estate owning this play, which was the success of Henry Miller, and was to be directed by William D. Taylor, Miss Pickford will continue under the direction of Marshall Neilan. The play under consideration is known at present as "How Could You Jean."

William D. Taylor will next direct Constance Talmadge in "Up the Road With Sally," a comedy drama, with the featured role said to be decidedly appropriate for this star. Miss Talmadge has just completed her first western made picture for Select program, which is titled "The Shuttle."

Universal Slows Down



Speaking from the standpoint of new subjects put in production, Universal was certainly a quiet place last week. Not a new story has been handed over to a company to film, as it so happens that all are continuing on productions previously started. There are two exceptions to this rule, as two companies this week finished their subjects, but as yet scripts have not been prepared for them to immediately begin upon.

Wilfred Lucas has completed the film, "The Heart of the Desert," co-starring Monroe Salisbury and Ruth Clifford, and will spend a week or more in the preparation of his next story. In the writing of this Miss Bess Meredyth will collaborate with Lucas.

"Hill Billy," the Western subject made by Jack Ford with Harry Carey featured, and supported by Molly Malone, M. K. Wilson, Vester Pegg and others, has been filmed completely, and Carey and Ford will spend two or three weeks together writing Western subjects before production is resumed.

The next few days will see "Lady Eldon's Daughter," co-starring Ella Hall and Emory Johnson, completed by Douglas Gerrard.

Lynn Reynolds has gotten well under way in the production of a subject with Franklyn Farnum as star, supported by Juanita Hansen and a big cast.

Director Elmer Clifton continues in the filming of Gelett Burgess' story, "The Wildcat" with Priscilla Dean and Ashton Dearholt as principals.

Stuart Paton is now directing "The Other Thing" with Carmel Meyers, Kenneth Harlan and Harry Carter. This is a screen story by Harvey Gates, adapted from the magazine story written by Blair Hall. The subject will be completed in five reels.

American Makes "Extra!"

The American studio at Santa Barbara was somewhat of a quiet place during the past week, owing to the absence of a portion of the staff which was away shooting exterior locations. The only company working at the studio was that headed by Mary Miles Minter, which is now engaged in the production of "Extra! Extra!" a newspaper story by Will M. Ritchey.

Director Lloyd Ingraham and the Margarita Fischer American company spent a greater portion of the week in Los Angeles, where scenes were made for "Ann's Finish," the fourth of the comedy dramas written by Beatrice Van, especially for Miss Fischer. The company visiting Los Angeles included Jack Mower, David Howard, John Gough, Robert Cline, Harry Banks and Adelaide Elliott.

Announcement is made from the American studios of the engagement of two well-known screen writers who will work with the new editor, Will M. Ritchey, in the preparation of American stories and scenarios. One is William Parker, who was formerly writer for the American, but for the past year has been with Fox, Metro and the Bluebird studios. Parker is author of more than 200 produced screen stories, and during his first engagement with the American wrote "The Bruiser" and "The Craving," which were produced with William Russell as star. Carl Koolidge, the other addition to the staff, is also a former American writer, who for the past eight or ten months has been with Universal and writing for the screen on a free-lance basis and whose works have been widely commended.

Louis Allen Whalen, juvenile actor who played with several of the southern California companies, died this week at Santa Barbara after an illness of several months. He is the son of Mrs. A. K. Whalen, auditor of the American Film Company studios at Santa Barbara.

Bringing Them Into a Close-Up

By Longacre

WHAT will stand for a long time as America's greatest patriotic picture, is the Frohman Amusement Corporation's latest feature, "My Own United States," a most skilful combination of historical fact and adapted fiction prepared by Anthony P. Kelly in which Arnold Daly stars. The historic rivalry of Alexander Hamilton and Aaron Burr, those two brilliant statesmen of the early days of the Republic, and Edward Everett Hale's classic, "The Man Without a Country," have been combined by the author into one thrilling whole. Its producers will receive a due amount of praise for the patriotic propaganda offered within its eight reels, yet at no time does this most praiseworthy element crowd out the personal interest created by the story. Those super-tragic moments in the exile of Philip Nolan when he addresses himself to a young sailor lad: "And for your country boy, and for that flag——," when he reads from Scott to the assembled seamen:

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said
'This is my own, my native land'"— and the awfulness of his own plight dawns on him anew, and finally his death, when to his ecstatic joy he learns how the United States has grown and progressed since his banishment, are tremendously stirring from the patriotic side, but there is a more dominating note of the deepest pathos in them. At the Rivoli, where "My Own United States" received an advance showing before a crowded house of professionals, the sniffles and the blowing of noses kept pace with the accompaniment rendered by the orchestra. And a trade audience, by the way, is often boisterous in its appreciation of a picture, but seldom obviously moved by any pathetice moments it may possess.

Mr. Kelly has throughout combined fact with fiction with apparent ease. For the benefit of the public it might be well to run an explanatory note among the other leaders on the picture to the effect that the Hamilton-Burr antagonism is historically true, while the story of "The Man Without a Country," which dovetails with the former, is Hale's fiction, but this is a point of minor importance. To our notion Mr. Kelly has done his best work in "My Own United States." The labor in research work, the effort demanded by such a complicated though crystal-clear continuity must have meant days of immeasurable work.

As for Arnold Daly, the performance he gives in his chief role, that of Philip Nolan, is certainly the best he has contributed to the screen. His characterization of the man whose exile from his native land proves such a tragedy is finished, subtle and nicely repressed. But "My Own United States" is a triumph for all connected with it. It is for Mr. Daly and Mr. Kelly, for John Noble, its director, for many others in the cast, for the art director and for the photographer and for Mr. Sherrill and the Frohman Amusement Corporation. Such a glorious piece of work should bring to its sponsors sincere thanks and praise besides the monetary considerations which are to be expected.

The place of the "kid" feature in the motion picture world seems to be very much disputed. Which of the many classes of people who journey to the theatre appreciate it most? Or rather which appreciates it? Certainly no feature with a juvenile star has ever sent box office records of the past to smash, and on the other hand, few if any of them, ever get that extremely unpopular fruit entitled the "raspberry" or the "razzberry" by some of our best and worst vaudeville performers. One thing, however, is quite certain. If the kid stuff is to maintain or gain an established place in the world of films, the producers should gain stories of a higher type for their juvenile stars.

Little Mary McAlister's last one, "Sadie Goes to Heaven," was accorded considerable praise. Baby Marie Osborne did two or three meritorious stories in her first days as star and Madge Evans, William A. Brady's dimunitive star, did perhaps her best work in "The Burglar." But the general run of such pictures is mediocre. Generally too much responsibility is placed on the shoulders of the little star. One reason why Madge's work in "The Burglar" stood out was because of the fact that she was not the sole principal but one of a number of leading players. And William Fox's spectacles with the celebrated band of kiddie players of the west coast are entertaining and amusing quite as much because of the fact that they are fantastical and elaborate as because of the kiddies.

This might indicate that the public cares little for a straight story in which the child is the means of reuniting estranged parents or smoothing over the differences between the aged father and the daughter who has married against his wishes. Something more than this "Little child shall lead them" idea is needed to make the little child's appearance a success—in a five-reeler at any rate. It must be backed by either a spectacle or a supporting cast of full fledged players among which the child is not dominant but merely importantly incidental.

As for the children who go to the theatre, it has long been recognized that they consume the stories of the grownup stars, such as William S. Hart, Charlie Chaplin, other slapstick comedians, Mary Pickford and Marguerite Clark, with a greater relish than they do the story supposedly specially prepared for them and presenting a juvenile player in the role of chief importance. Their cry is for action in even greater quantities than the grownups demand. Wild Indians, galloping horseman, train holdups, free for all fights, and eccentric comedy appeal to them. They are perhaps, fascinated by the actions of the child actor at first sight and for one or two reels thereafter but in five reels they seem to crave something a bit more stimulating. Not that the juvenile players have no place in the pictures, but why should they be expected to hold an audience's interest undivided over five reels, a feat which mature players in more virile stories often find difficult to accomplish?

"Innocent," Fanny Ward's first picture done for Pathe is one of the strongest five-reel dramas that has made its appearance in many a day. It makes an auspicious beginning for the new series of pictures with new stars that Pathe will issue during the coming year. A play admirably suited to the screen and offering Miss Ward a part of the type which a good player is always glad to get was George Broadhurst's "Innocent." It was an excellent choice—the results prove it. Such judgment as secured it for Miss Ward surely can not go far wrong in securing as suitable vehicles for Bryant Washburn, Frank Keenan and Bessie Love, the remaining three of Pathe's quartet of new stars. "Innocent" is a brilliant beginning for Pathe's new year. And the company's policies indicate that it is only a beginning.

Probably Mary Pickford's best characterization is contained in her latest Artcraft, "Stella Maris," an adaptation from William J. Locke's novel. She carries a dual role. The title part shows her to her usual radiantly appealing advantage. But it is as Unity Blake, the clumsy, ugly duckling of an orphan asylum that Miss Pickford achieves her triumph. With hair drawn tightly back and braided, with colorless lips, a slight lop-sided carriage, and with an expression that always shows the pain the little waif has borne both spiritually and physically.

"My Own United States"

(Frohman Amusement Corporation—Eight Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

THE Frohman Amusement Corporation's epic, "My Own United States" is a patriotic drama of the superlative type. Commencing with the story of the antagonism of Alexander Hamilton and Aaron Burr, it follows from this into "The Man Without a Country" that little tragedy of Philip Nolan exiled for his life from the United States. Anthony Paul Kelly has combined these two stories, the one from history, the other from fiction in excellent manner with the result that "My Own United States" presents a smooth story, interesting from beginning to end. It is a patriotic drama without any forced "hurrahs," it is a tragedy which brings forth unashamed tears, it is a narrative that always entertains and often thrills.

Such a production as this deserves presentation in the best of houses, for no situation of it strikes a false note. Its historic interest is great. The feud of Hamilton and Burr which developed to such serious proportions that it terminated in the famous duel in which the brilliant statesman lost his life is pictured with all accuracy. It is one of the most dramatic of the many dramatic passages in the history of our country, and its handling here is truly great. Duncan McRae's interpretation of Hamilton is convincingly stately and human, and Charles Graham's playing as Burr is of the same high order.

Mr. Kelly continues with the traitorous venture of Burr in Texas after the duel. In this Philip Nolan, the central figure of Hale's wonderful epic is implicated. There follows his capture, trial and conviction when he damns his country and expenses the desire that he never hear the name of the United States again. His life on the high seas, a respected captive of the American navy, where his wish is rigidly enforced to the letter, is filled with episodes that bring tears to the eyes. Excerpts from the book, speeches used as sub-titles, are introduced propitiously and with wonderful effect. But the acting of Arnold Daly, the star, is perhaps the outstanding feature of this portion of the picture. His characterization of Philip Nolan, who in his exile grows to love his forbidden country more with each day, is one of the finest pieces of acting ever contributed to the screen. It will rank with with his best performances on the stage, may even transcend them.

The body of the picture is linked up with the present world's crisis. At the beginning of it a descendent of Philip Nolan watches the American troops marching down Fifth Avenue on their way to France with something of scorn. His attitude calls forth the main story from his grandfather and when it is all told, the Nolan of the present is so impressed that he hurriedly makes for a recruiting office.

John Noble has produced the picture in fine style. As is the case with the author, Mr. Kelly, it is the best work he has done. Nor can the proper costumes, settings, etc., be overlooked. Art Director W. Bruce Bradley has seen that these are correct in every detail. The photographic work in charge of H. O. Carlton is also commendable. A large cast does work of an unusually high order. Thomas Donnelly's General George Churchill and Sydney Bracey's Captain Rene Gautier are well defined characters. Anna Lehr leads the women of the cast with a performance as Agnes Churchill, later Mrs. Philip Nolan, in which her varied capabilities are given full play. Good characterizations are also given by James Levering, Edward Dunn, F. C. Earle and Marie Du Chette, but it seems in no way fair to single these players out from among the remaining members of the cast, so high is its average.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Lieutenant Philip Nolan (Arnold Daly) sides with Aaron Burr (Charles Graham) in his political feud with Alexander Hamilton (Duncan McRae). He becomes entangled in Burr's scheme for a southwestern empire and is tried for treason. In the crowded court-room, with patriotism at its highest, he expresses his contempt for the country in the oath, "Damn the United States. I wish I might never hear of the United States again." So the judge pronounces his sentence, which is to follow out Nolan's expressed wish. He parts with his wife (Anna Lehr) and is made prisoner aboard a man-of-war. All newspapers and books given him are carefully deleted of the country's name. None of the officers ever refer to the United States in his presence, though in all other respects they accpt him as an qual. Even his heroic conduct in keeping pirates from the magazine room of the vessel when they raid it and for the moment overwhelm the defenders earns him no respite from his cruel sentence. It is not until he is on his death-bed that the doctor relates to the eager Nolan the growth of his country up to the time of the Civil War—and Nolan dies blessing the nation he once cursed.

His lineal descenedant on hearing this tale from the lips of his grandfather is so inspired that he joins America's army of today. The cast also includes Claude Cooper, William V. Miller, Frederick Truesdale, Jack Hamilton, Richard Wongemann, Frederick Herzog, Frank Murray, Gerald Day, Jack Burns, Helen Mulholland, Mrs. Allen Walker, Mrs. Mary Kennison Carr and Baby Carr.

"The Spirit of '17"

(Lasky-Paramount—Five Reels)

JUDGE WILLIS BROWN, of the Chicago Juvenile Court, is the author of this patriotic number which features Jack Pickford. It is a picture filled with solid sentiment, good thrills and a plentiful supply of comedy. Pickford takes the part of Davy Glidden, a youth in his early 'teens whose father is the superintendent of the Old Soldiers' Home. He and an old veteran discover the plot of German spies to create a strike in the nearby mines and the manner in which they lead out the other members of the Old Guard who once more serve their country by preventing the strike, brings the picture to a fine climax.

The entire five reels are filled with incidental touches of sentiment and comedy. Captain Jerico Norton, the proudest member of the Home, who never tires of relating to Davy thrilling incidents of the days of '61 and '97, is played by L. M. Wells, a character actor of ability and distinction. Davy's romantic tendencies, which lead him to fall in love with a girl many years his senior, furnish a vein of light comedy that is most welcome. The scene at the end when the girl kisses him, telling him that she loves him "more than Randall," while she holds hands with this gentleman, unseen by Davy, is delightfully humorous.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Davy Glidden (Jack Pickford), son of Superintendent Glidden (G. H. Geldert) of the Old Soldiers' Home, together with Captain Jerico Norton (L. M. Wells), one of the inmates, discovers German spies (James Farley and Seymour Hastings) plotting to bring about a strike in the adjacent mining town. Davy and the Captain acquaint the other old soldiers of the plot, and on the day the strike is called when the mine superintendent is amazed at the antagonistic attitude of his men, the young boy and the old veteran arrive at the head of the heroes of other days. Their appearance frightens the strikers into surrender and they return to work with a vengeance. Their heroism is rewarded, Davy's particularly, by a kiss from Flora (Katherine McDonald), an older girl whom he admires. Her rather lazy fiance, fired by the patriotism of the boy, enlists in the army.

Edythe Chapman, Charles Arling, Virginia Ware, William Chester, Helen Eddy, John Burton, Ashton Dearholt, Tom Bates and J. W. Johnston complete the cast.

"Stella Maris"

(Artcraft—Six Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

IT is gratifying to note that "Stella Maris," Mary Pickford's latest Artcraft, calls for no unfavorable criticism in any department. More than that it deserves unstinted praise in every department. The handling of William J. Locke's novel on which it is based, Miss Pickford's quaintly appealing performance in the title role and her extraordinarily remarkable interpretation of the part of Unity Blake, the excellent production and the superb lightings—in fact every department of it—is superlative. The charm and the pathos of Mr. Locke's novel, its very originality of characterization and treatment formed the foundation of—we say it only after careful recollection of past performances, including even "The Poor Little Rich Girl"—the best Pickford picture.

As Stella Maris Miss Pickford is seen as a crippled child who has been brought up by her rich relatives unacquainted with the struggle of life. Everything to her is a Utopia until she gains the use of her limbs and the tragedies and sorrows of the world come for the first time to her notice. This is a pretty part at first and most appealing when the moment of her awakening comes. But it is the role of Unity Blake that offers Miss Pickford her great opportunity. As the crippled waif of the orphanage who has never known a word of kindness until her meeting with John Risca and who sacrifices her own life that he may be made happy with Stella Maris, she shows a marvelous ability as an actress. Her expressions of which the dominating one is pain—pain because of her unhappy girlhood and pain because the happiness brought her by Risca proves a mockery—sound the character to its very depths. It is a wonderful performance—tremendous in its appeal so in contrast to that contained in the other character she portrays.

Frances Marion who prepared the scenario has caught the true spirit of Mr. Locke's original work. Intelligently constructing the novel for screen use, she has contrasted the lives of Stella Maris and Unity Blake so that each appeals to the greatest possible extent. Marshall Neilan in the directing, has again proved himself as among the few artistic directors in the production business. As the supervision of the production was also in his hands it may be assumed that it is he who is responsible for the wonderful light effects secured by the cameraman.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Stella Maris (Mary Pickford), a cripple, has been brought up by her aunt, Lady Blount (Ida Waterman), and uncle (Herbert Standing), unaware of the strife and struggle in the outside world. A relative of Lady Blount, John Risca (Conway Tearle), is constantly attentive to Stella, brightening her life with various presents and spending many hours with her. He is her ideal. She believes him perfect—believes his life as happy as hers. But in reality Risca has suffered from his marriage. His wife (Camille Ankewich) is a drunkard and after a time he refuses to live with her. She procures Unity Blake (Mary Pickford) from the orphan asylum to work for her. But one day in a rage she beats her to unconsciousness. For this she is sent to prison for a term of years and Unity is cared for by Risca. She becomes his devout slave as he alone has treated her kindly. An operation on Stella Maris proves successful, but with full health she comes to the realization that the life of the world is one immense struggle. She learns of Risca's marriage and is heart-broken. Unity, wishing that Risca be happy, kills his wife and then herself. In this way does she repay her debt to her one friend.

"His Robe of Honor"

(Paralta—Seven Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

THE average man, woman or child who goes to the theatre looks to be entertained; and the more unusual the entertainment, the more he likes it. It is all well and good for scenario writers to preach to young hopefuls that they will find their drama in the lives of the ice-man and the scullery maid, but if the planet Mars was their background instead of the Earth, they and their doings would be more eagerly received, because the planet Mars is not known—it is a new and unexplored field. "His Robe of Honor" does not take up among the Martians, but it does transport us through the inner workings of corrupt politics, a field which offers, in this case, as fascinating array of persons as could be found. Exposed by Ethel and James Dorrance, these persons become as interesting in their actions as the people of the city's underworld, the inhabitants of Broadway or of the olden West, all sets of characters who make ideal pictures because so few of us know them well. So "His Robe of Honor" is first of all unconventional and consequently beyond the average in entertainment value.

What, however, is probably of more important than even this is the fact that it starts the Henry Walthall series of Paralta Plays. Mr. Walthall, once termed the best actor on the screen, and who, as far as we know, still deserves that title, carries the role of Julian Randolph, unscrupulous lawyer, whose reformation begins when he meets the certain young woman, Laura Nelson. She gives him the ambition and the hope to reform. His last little trick gains him the post of Judge and then he treads the straight and narrow path, not swerving from it even when acts of his past rise up in his way to disturb him. Mr. Walthall performs with that same wonderful expressiveness which he showed in his former pictures. He is so relaxed, so unobtrusive, and yet so dominating, so subtle in expression and gesture that he is always the center of attraction while on the screen.

As for the story, the Dorrances have filled it with incidents that only those of the newspaper world are familiar with. The corrupt practices of Randolph when first introduced are interesting in their originality and are not without their humorous side. His reformation subsequent to his meeting with Laura is unfolded to the tune of any number of strong situations. The scenario prepared by Julian Louis Lamothe lacks nothing in explicitness althought it could have been closer woven in a few places. Rex Ingram's direction is adequate.

Lois Wilson as Laura makes a sweet and appealing opposite to Mr. Walthall. Mary Charleson, one of the most competent actresses of the films, gives an excellent interpretation of Roxana Frisbee, Randolph's co-worker. Noah Beery, J. J. Dowling and Fred Montague contribute performances of the first order.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Julian Randolph (Henry B. Walthall), crooked lawyer, in induced to sign an agreement with the traction company of the cities to the effect that he will take up no more cases against them, so successful has he been in trumping up false evidence and witnesses for the use of his clients. A journey to the office of Bruce Nelson (J. J. Dowling), the traction company's attorney, brings him in contact with his niece, Laura (Lois Wilson) and then and there Randolph realizes his love for her. When Boss Nordhoff (Noah Beery, Jr.) approaches him with the request that he defend his brother (Eugene Palette), a cold-blooded murderer, Randolph takes the case with the promise that he be appointed judge providing he is successful. And he is, because three men chosen for the jury are in his power. Firmly established in a position of honor, he pays court to Laura, who readily responds. Their happiness is interrupted by the lie of Roxana Frisbee (Mary Charleson), Randolph's aide in his former dealings, who declares to Laura, while in a jealous rage, that Randolph belongs to her. But subsequently seeing the unhappiness she has wrought she confesses to the falsehood. Randolph's supreme test comes when he is obliged to hand down a decision on a case between the state and the traction company. Nelson threatens him with exposure of his past unless he complies with the company's wishes but, reminded of his duty by Laura, he takes the honest way and decides in favor of the city.

"Jerry on the Railroad"

(Cub-Mutual—One Reel)

Reviewed by F. G. Spencer

GEORGE OVEY in "Jerry on the Railroad," puts over a new style of humor, differing considerably from the raw slapstick variety for which he is noted. He develops a propensity for detective work and after saving a railroad bridge from being dynamited, he saves a girl from being poisoned, all of which is a keen, appreciable relief from his stunts of old.

The reel is well photographed, nicely directed and will, beyond a doubt, prove an acceptable "filler" to any program.

"Wolves of the Rail"

(Artcraft—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

FOR swiftness of action "Wolves of the Rail," William S. Hart's third Artcraft is also his best. He is seen in the role of the road agent, more commonly known as the train robber. Reformation comes at the dying mother's bedside, and then he forces a detective to change identities with him and concentrates his efforts on vanquishing the band of robbers of which he was once leader. The story, by Denison Clift, is developed logically, and a fine vein of suspense is introduced when the robber masks as the detective. Mr. Hart performs a real thriller when he rides his horse alongside an engine which is tearing up the rails on the same track as the oncoming train, leaps to the cab and brings it to a halt, only narrowly averting a collision. Following this, there is a lot of fine fighting between the robbers and troops from the train, and for a finale the railroad president, so impressed with the character of the man who has swept the country of robbers, assists him and the girl in a getaway despite the protests of the real detective.

Real Hart material was provided in "Wolves of the Rail" and the actor has taken full advantage of it. His role is somewhat apart from those he has been accustomed to playing in the past and this originality makes for better entertainment all around. Vola Vale as heroine, C. Norman Hammond as the outraged detective and Melbourne MacDowell as the railroad president contribute much to the success of the picture. Special settings, such as a station, office and switch tower, create an atmosphere of the utmost realism, while the photography is of the best.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Inspired to reform at the deathbed of his mother Buck Andrade (William S. Hart), train robber, journeys back to the town of his activities. On the train he meets Cassidy (C. Norman Hammond), detective from New York, sent out West to round up the gang once headed by Buck. The train is held up, but Buck surprises his old comrades by holding them up in turn and driving them away. Cassidy learns Buck's identity and places him under arrest. Buck, however, turns the tables quickly and taking Cassidy to his mountain cabin makes him prisoner. Taking his letters of introduction, he presents them to the division master and begins to scour the country for the robbers. He succeeds in rounding up the majority of them. His romance with Faith Lawson (Vola Vale) also begins here. Cassidy's escape and the arrival of President Lamantier (Melbourne MacDowell) precipitate matters to a climax. Buck is revealed in his true colors and is about to be placed under arrest when the station is attacked by a band of Mexicans, headed by Pablo (Billy Elmer), and Pasquale (Thomas Kurihara), ex-members of the hold-up band. A train load of soldiers is due to arrive at any moment. Pablo starts an engine off down the track with the idea of causing disaster. Buck, his knowledge of the country serving him in good stead, takes a short cut and, leaping to the cab of the engine, saves the day. The soldiers vanquish the Mexicans and the president in gratitude and admiration makes it easy for Buck to escape from Cassidy with Faith.

"Men Who Have Made Love to Me"

(Essanay-Perfection Pictures—Seven Parts)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

"I, MARY MacLANE," by Mary MacLane, has been made into a picture by Essanay under the title, "Men Who Have Made Love to Me," and the star is none other than Mary MacLane. "So that you may know me," says she into the lens of the camera between puffs on her cigarette, "I, Mary MacLane, will tell you of six piquant love episodes in my life—all of them damnably real." And then is pictured much of the contents of her book, a book which, by the way, has created more than one sensation, and her affairs with a callow youth, a literary man, a younger son, a prize fighter, a bank clerk, and a husband of another are unfolded one after another. Each of these passages as narrated by Miss MacLane seems to bring out her own egoism more than anything else. Her own life, her own existence is omni-potent, her affairs always interesting but unfathomable. When finally she is through with the "husband of another," she questions her maid as to whether true love exists. And the maid, having just been married, answers "oui, m'amselle." The maid's one affair has not been piquant, it has been highly successful from her point of view. But, being an egoist, Miss MacLane is still inclined to doubt the existence of a perfect love. It is something of a pity she was—and is—so cynically self-centered, an attitude which naturally tends to distort love and forbid it its right of trespass.

How the affairs of this modern George Sand will impress their beholders is a question of the mooted variety. They have interested many already on the printed page, they will attract more and interest more in divers ways. "The stripping naked of a woman's soul" is bound to contain interesting material at least. And exciting? At times, yes. And a little aggravating also, and finally disappointing to a certain extent. Aggravating because it is always I, Mary MacLane, and because the impression is conveyed that she is an egotist as well as an egoist. The lofty heights from which she seems to regard her six lovers, from which point she dissects them bit by bit, generating the idea that she must have a male Mary MacLane, if she finally select a life mate, seem to grate on the nerves of the common males and females that go through the world less analytical, less cynical and more contented with things as they come along. And, unlike a play of the same type, for instance, the "Madame Sand," which New York has only just seen, the various episodes bear a certain sameness in their development and termination. Offset by a dialogue of brilliant wit, such as was the play, the "Men Who Have Made Love to Me," of Mary MacLane's might have proven as entertaining as the "Madame Sand" of Mrs. Fiske's.

All this when considered as bearing upon the manner in which the photoplay will be accepted leads to a certain definite conclusion. It is to be expected that with all the advertising Mary MacLane has had in the past—with all that Essanay is giving her in the present, that there will be a public eagerly awaiting the picture. And so it should have successful runs—from the box-office standpoint. The audiences will, in all probability, accept it as more or less of a curiosity—to be discussed, analyzed, criticised, favorably and unfavorably, much as she of the six love affairs discusses, analyzes and criticises each of them.

Miss MacLane's personality registers as wierd and mystic on the screen. Her eyes express her struggle to understand. Her whole attitude is one of aloofness, cynicism—she anticipates the conclusion of each affair—seems rather bored about it. The six actors who one after another play the six men of the title are competent and selected with a fine regard to type.

Arthur Berthelet has given the picture a good setting and the photography is to be commended.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

The callow youth (Ralph Graves) fascinated by Mary MacLane makes her his confidant, but soon bores her, and she is glad to send him back to his sweetheart. The literary man (R. Paul Harvey) is too dominating, and the break comes soon. The younger son (Clif Worman) proves rather nasty in a roadhouse, and she is rescued from him by the prize fighter (Alador Prince). She gives him up because of an appeal made by his sweetheart, and an idealistic bank clerk (Clarence Derwent) is next. He paints rosy pictures of marriage, but it is all at an end when he discovers that she smokes and drinks. The husband of another (Fred Tiden) proves altogether impossible when he breaks into her room and attacks her.

"THE IMPOSTOR," a play produced by the Empire All-Star Corporation from the Frohman success of the same name, is the feature offering of Mutual for the middle of the month. Ann Murdock gives a likeable interpretation of the country girl who goes to New York to win fame through the medium of her voice, only to find that the great city has no ear for those who have not already sung their way into its capricious favor. She tries and tries, but New York will not even give her a chance to demonstrate her ability and finally the inevitable happens. She meets a man and innocently goes to his hotel with him.

Some of his friends happen in on the little tea party, and to clear himself he introduces her as his wife's wealthy sister. They take her home with them and she is forced to play the part of an impostor. Miss Murdock could have perhaps made the part more effective if she had played it with a little more emotion. Her acting at times was just a little lackadaisical and colorless.

David Powell as the son of the social climbers is convincing and does good work. Lionel Adams also is to be highly congratulated for the way he plays the role of Charles Owen, the man with offices in Chicago, New York and Boston. He screens well and has a pleasing personality.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Mary Fenton (Ann Murdock), a girl of refinement with a beautiful voice, leaves the little village where she has lived all her life, and goes to New York to continue her musical studies. Through a combination of circumstances she finds herself alone and penniless. All her attempts to find employment end in disappointment.

Charles Owen (Lionel Adams), a young married man, meeting her on the street, chivalrously offers her the refuge of his hotel apartment. In order to relieve an embarrassing situation, Owen introduces her to friends at the hotel as his wife's sister. They invite her to accompany her home as their guest, and to avoid suspicion she complies.

Later Owen and his wife come to the house, and a frank confession on Mary's part relieves the tenseness of the situation. Blake Walford (David Powell), son of the folks with whom she has been staying while sailing under false colors, decides that he loves her even after he discovers she has been an impostor, and the story ends with Mary agreeing to be his wife.

"Cheating the Public"

(Fox Standard Picture—Seven Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

"CHEATING THE PUBLIC" is a melodrama that makes use of a much-discussed topic as its basis, that of food profiteering. This is employed as a complement to the old struggle between capital and labor, throwing added sympathy in the scales for the labor and creating an even greater villain than before of the personality representing capital. The picture is frank melodrama and makes no pretense at hiding under the guise of anything approaching the subtle. For instance, the food monopolist who controls the canning factory and a large chain of grocery stores and consequently has the people in a vise-like grip, "damns them all to hell" constantly. When warned that Congress and the President will interfere and bring him to an accounting he curls his lip fiendishly and swears some more.

Consequently when Mary Garvin, only a factory girl, is convicted of murdering him, there is no divided sympathy—it is all for her. But Mary does not die in the electric chair, although she is just about to sit in it when the pardon comes. To secure the pardon the hero is obliged to engage in a thrilling race with the express in which is the governor. The automobile races the train, up hill and down dale, and performs the usual stunt of crossing over the track only missing the engine's cow-catcher by an inch. With the pardon secured the hero continues his race to the jail. Of course, the governor might have stopped the train and 'phoned, but melodramas only regard 'phones as useful when a situation demands them. No hero could perform a last minute rescue as thrillingly by wire as by tire.

"Cheating the Public" in other respects has all the old tricks that go to make such a melodrama ever popular. And brought up to date by the introduction of the food profiteering angle, it should prove as capable of bringing the cheers and hisses of the present public as its forerunners were in the past. The story was written by Mary Murillo and done into scenario form by Richard Stanton and Ed. Sedgwick. There are some turns of it that are handled rather clumsily, but the majority of them are well worked out while the tried and proven tricks of this type of picture carry it through successfully.

Mr. Stanton's direction is good in all the big situations. The race between train and automobile, interspersed with cutbacks of Mary's preparation for death, is handled in fine form. The mystery surrounding the murder of the villain is well built and the clearing of it introduced a la mode. Mr. Stanton shows an apparently irrepressible desire for introducing comedy relief, some of which is welcome and a little of which should have been left undone. The touches of bar-room humor coming before the real murderer's confession are somewhat out of place in the picture. Photographically, "Cheating the Public" is excellent, some good effects laying stress on the dramatic action.

Enid Markey as Mary Garvin gives a telling performance. Her scenes in prison, where terror-stricken at the thought of her impending death, she becomes half crazed, are acted with tremendous realism. A more villainous John Dowling than that rendered by Ralph Lewis would be hard to find. Bertram Grassby is his son, the hero, who works reform where his father has worked evil. Tom Wilson, Charles Edler, Wanda Petit, Carry Clark Ward and three juveniles are much in the limelight and perform always advantageously.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

John Dowling (Ralph Lewis), factory owner and food profiteer, cuts wages and raises prices in his lust for money. The employees strike, but, Dowling, secure in his position, refuses to meet their terms. Finally Mary Garvin (Enid Markey), a factory girl, who has cared for her three little brothers and sisters since her mother's death, appeals to him for aid. He refuses. Because she is the daughter of the woman who once refused his offer of marriage, he conceives the fiendish idea of avenging himself upon Mary personally. He attacks her, and carries her away upstairs. A struggle ensues. Mary procures a pistol, and fires.

Soon afterward she is on the stand charged with the murder of Dowling. His son, Chester (Bertram Grassby), listens with horror to the disclosure of his father's rule of oppression. Nevertheless Mary is convicted and sentenced to the electric chair. The night before the fatal day, "Bull" Thompson (Tom Wilson), foreman under Dowling, since removed by Chester in his reforms, gets drunk and boasts of having shot Dowling. Then comes the race for the governor, and the dash to the prison with the pardon—with the proverbial "in the nick-of-time" rescue. Afterward all is rosey at the factory, and Mary and Chester are seen happily married.

Fanny Midgsley, James Titus, Henry Peal, Edward Peil, Joseph Hartley, James Morgan, Arthur Glynn, Count von Hardenburg, James McNeil, Arthur Shilling, Miles McCormack and Beverly Griffith complete the cast.

"Broadway Love"

(Bluebird—Five Reels)

THIS is a very fascinating picture which shows why some New York chorus girls have elegant apartments on Central Park West and why others live in hall rooms. The love of those of Broadway, suggests the author, is not love but good old U. S. currency, except when a girl of the type of Midge O'Hara comes along. Midge encounters a man from the West, Henry Rockwell, whose idea of a show-girl is definite but wrong when it comes to Midge. It is she who awakens within him a knowledge that a girl can be of the chorus and still be capable of loving with the same degree of purity prevalent in the best regulated families. And all this with the parallel story of Cherry Blow, queen of the chorus, she of the elegant apartment, who eventually comes around to Midge's way of thinking too makes entertainment that can be relied upon to thoroughly satisfy.

Ida May Park who prepared the scenario from W. Carey Wonderly's story which appeared not long ago in Snappy Stories, and who directed, has instilled great realism into her work, besides bringing out its high lights in ship-shape fashion. Midge's peep into the lives of her sister chorus girls, the accident which Rockwell causes, his awakening and finally her awakening to his real self are episodes handled with taste. Realism is never lacking and the comedy element introduced by the first appearance of Elmer Watkins, the drunken orgy in Cherry's apartments and the comparison in the philosophies of Midge and Cherry is of a good type.

Dorothy Phillips does Midge with her usual emotional effectiveness. A better type for Cherry than Juanita Hansen would be difficult to find. She has that beauty, rare but typical of the type she represents and acts the sort with just the right degree of abandon. William Stowell as Rockwell, Harry Von Meter as Chalvey and Lon Chaney as Watkins do commendable work. The supporting cast, including the remaining members of the chorus, is unusually well selected.

"Broadway Love" has that peculiar fascination about it, supposedly possessed by Broadway itself before the lights were out and this combined with the story itself and the complete manner in which it has been presented make it an unusually good buy for the average exhibitor.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Midge O'Hara (Dorothy Phillips) chorus girl, attends a party in the apartment of Cherry Blow (Juanita Hansen), queen of the Garden theatre. Her first encounter is with Jack Chalvey (Harry Von Meter), who in a secluded room of the apartment is about to blow his brains out, as Cherry has gone straight through his bank roll at high speed. Saving Jack from death and giving him renewed hope, she attempts to partake in the fun. But she finds it too gross for her liking. Henry Rockwell (William Stowell) escorts her home. In the cab he insults her and she, struggling from his embrace, crashes through the door to the pavement. Severely injured she is taken to the hospital and carefully provided for by Henry, whose ideas on chorus girls have been reversed subsequent to the catastrophe. The action then shifts to a seaside resort. Midge meets Jack again and believes she loves him. Elmer Watkins (Lon Chaney), her girlhood sweetheart, refuses to believe her decent and makes insinuations. When Henry arrives he attempts to arrange for the wedding of Midge and Jack, much as he loves the girl himself. But with this Midge discovers how much she loves Henry, and Jack finds Cherry so changed that she accepts his proposal of marriage.

ENTER again Madge Evans, borne along on the meagre situations of a plot adequately described by the single line, "a little child shall lead them." This time it is brothers that are estranged. The father of the little girl is poor, his brother rich; and it remains for Beth to prove the means of the reconciliation. This comes after five reels, through which the action runs at a pace never in danger of breaking the speed limit. The few situations there are cater directly to little Madge, but there are hardly enough of them to keep the average audience from becoming restless.

The reels contain a good bit of padding, which becomes rather noticeable when close-ups are introduced with little regard for their proper value and prolonged to a superfluous extent. The story itself could have been better done for all its conventionality. The birth of the antagonism between the brothers is not effectively planted, although probably a full reel is taken up, bringing about their separation. Beth's life in the artists' quarter of New York which includes the incident of her posing for a sculptor is more or less detached from the main line of action and obviously gains a place in the picture by no other right than the footage it consumes. Her scenes with Mrs. Colton, wife of the older brother, who has lost her child through an accident, are the best in the picture. The pathos of the situation is well brought out and registers nicely.

But while Madge Evans is a most capable little actress and fully able to rise to a big situation, "Gates of Gladness," ambles along its own sweet way with little regard for either her talent or that of the other members of the cast. George MacQuarrie, Niles Welch and Gerda Holmes appear in prominent parts, and always appreciate and realize their opportunities. Rosina Henley, who has been seen before in parts of minor importance in World pictures, takes the role of Beth's mother excellently, playing with a naturalness and reserve that deserves high praise. The large estate on which exteriors of the rich brother's home were photographed offered a number of shots for the cameraman, displaying landscape gardening at its best and richest. Harley Knowles directed from a scenario provided by John Clymer and Harry Hoyt.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Myron Leeds (Niles Welch) angered at his father's refusal to permit his marriage to Mary (Rosina Henley), leaves home to live in the city, where he pursues a career as an artist—but in vain. After several years he has been unable to make more than a bare living for his wife and daughter Beth (Madge Evans), and the coming of another little one to his home makes the outlook black indeed. Roger Leeds (George MacQuarrie), his brother, having succeeded to his father's estate shuts himself off from the rest of the world. When his little boy (Baby Joan) dies from exposure he becomes harder than ever. His wife (Gerda Holmes) sorrows greatly over the tragedy of her life. Finally the old housekeeper, Norah (Mrs. Stuart Robson), conceives the idea of appealing to Myron. Her suggestion that Beth visit her as her niece is adopted for the sake of the relief it will bring to Mary. Beth soon melts Roger, and her presence acts as a tonic to his wife's nerves. Myron, still unsuccessful, breaks into Roger's house with intent to rob. Beth is awakened and descends the stairs. A shot from Roger's pistol grazes her arm, and this slight accident proves the means of a general reunion of the Leeds family.

"THE RECRUIT," which is the first of a series of comedies to be released via state rights by the Jester Comedy Company, beginning in February, serves to introduce to American audiences Twede-Dan, whose aptness at comedy in all its forms is given ample sway. That this new funster on the picture horizon will find a hearty welcome wherever his products are shown is firmly predicted, as his work is a combination of all that can be expected in the laugh-raising art. Twede-Dan balks at no "stunt" which the director may care to name, and that these risky but laughable situations are numerous and excellently done is attested by "The Recruit."

If timeliness is ever worth anything in comedy, it should join Twede-Dan's efforts and make this initial Jester picture good for a greatly replenished box office and unusually satisfied audiences. The story, which starts with the first shot and runs evenly through to the final fade-out, is of the rapid-fire order, with slapstick here and there, but of a subdued sort. It shows Twede-Dan in an effort to enlist for his country in order to win the girl he wants. But failing in this does not keep him from falling asleep and dreaming of accomplishing many hero feats, with his love rewarded in the end. For the awakening a clever punch has been provided, which is sure to send the audience away not with a smile but a full-grown chuckle, and with other forms of commendation.

THERE are flashes of real humor in this single reeler, wherein Billie Rhodes is featured. The title, "Their Little Kid" is apt, if the commoner vernacular be recognized in comedy, as doubtless it will be. In its double meaning lies the foundation of the theme, for this young married couple are happy and live in expectation of a substantial windfall from Jack's rich uncle.

Uncle wires them one day that he is about to visit them as he is anxious to "see the kid." Thinking uncle means their baby, which so far has not put in an appearance, and fearful of disappointing Uncle, Jack sallies forth to round up a youngster by hook or crook. He first steals one from a nurse in the park, only to discover later that the child is of ebony hue.

So many ludicrous situations arise, and many tense situations are revealed that this will prove an acceptable filler in any theatre.

"ZONGAR, the dare devil of Romance," is constructed mainly to give George Larkin in the title role an opportunity of showing how necessary it is to live right and take regular physical exercises, and throughout the five reels he has unbounded opportunities of displaying his prowess as an all round athlete. He swims well, is fleet of foot and apparently takes any and every risk without so much as a second thought, and even after the most strenuous tests of endurance does not exhibit the slightest signs of fatigue.

Bernarr MacFadden edited the film, which might aptly be termed "MacFadden propaganda," for moderation in eating, total abstinence of alcoholic liquors and persistent gymnasium training are the keynotes of the production.

Some really wonderful stunts are pulled off by this perfect specimen of right living and quite a few thrills are recorded, chief of which may be mentioned his fistic battle with eight men aboard a yawl, in which he gives an able demonstration of jiu jitsu tactics. Then again his rescuing a girl from an auto from the deck of a low flying aeroplane affords a thrill of capacity calibre. These two are cited simply as proof of the foregoing statement concerning physical culture.

Throughout the theme there runs a tale of love and intrigue, the villain of the plot being Jack Hopkins, who, as Richard Sutton, attempts to foist his mistress on Zongar, and incidentally take Helen Thorpe (Grace Davidson) from Zongar. To effect his purpose he poisons Helen's mind again Zongar and persuades her to engage herself to him.

The photography is good throughout and the locations selected are idealistic for the proper display of the subject, including as they do a cliff overlooking a pretty body of water from which cliff Zongar makes a high dive to rescue two girls who by the way are fighting in the water; here again is shown a fine example of the result of physical training.

The picture throughout is well balanced and will make a good state rights proposition.

"Innocent"

(Pathe—Five Reels)

FANNIE WARD presents the title role of George Broadhurst's stage play, "Innocent," as adapted to screen and presented by Pathe, with such fine artistic ability that the writer will venture the assertion that she equals, if not surpasses, her success in the role of the young wife in "The Cheat." "Innocent" is adapted from Mr. Broadhurst's play as presented by A. H. Woods. The adaptation was made by Ouida Bergere and produced by Pathe under the direction of George Fitzmaurice.

There are three qualities which stand out with prominence in this production—Miss Ward's artistic presentation of the title role: the strength and fascination of the drama and the work of Director Fitzmaurice. The fourth quality should be added in justice to the work of the fine support given Miss Ward by John Miltern, Armand Kalitz and Frederick Perry. John Milton, who originated the role of John Wyndham in A. H. Wood's stage production, works opposite Miss Ward with ability, strength of character and a clear-cut appreciation for the job that is before him.

"Innocent" strikes home with a force that lifts the characters from a state of pantomimic existence on the gold fibre, to the reality. The screen is forgotten—it becomes, not the artificial stage on which is projected motion pictures, but one that has been transformed to the drowsy, sluggish life of the Orientals, their picturesque tea gardens, and their homes of bamboo. From the country of the Oriental, the scenes shift to the gay but artificial life of Paris and her gambling resorts. And with this shift Innocent is transformed from the unsophisticated little girl of the Orient to the little butterfly of Paris—never overstepping the bounds of propriety but ever subject to the temptation of being lead astray by the unscrupulous Parisian.

It is this uncertainty in the career of Innocent and the subtle, appreciative manner in which Miss Ward endows the character with all that the name implies—forgetting that she is Fannie Ward merely impersonating before the camera—but walking in the footsteps of a very human little girl whose instinct prompts her to play with the fire that has been kept beyond her reach for so long. In the same spirit as the child in arms will investigate the contents of a poisoned vial, Innocent investigates the new world into which she has been thrown, the new people with whom she comes in contact, unconsciously inviting danger and distressed because she is not permitted to bring harm to herself.

work of Miss Ward in this role gives to this screen drama a fascination, an appreciation that will live in the minds of those who see her with the same vivid remembrance that springs into being when "The Cheat" is mentioned.

As a drama, "Innocent" does not present the same tense, gripping moments that accompanied the exhibition of "The Cheat," but Miss Ward's faultless characterization, her versatility and her interpretation of the subtle, inner emotions of the character Innocent, will live in the same realm of excellence and perfection as now surrounds her role in "The Cheat."

Comparisons are said to be odious but no such intimation is meant to be conveyed by the frequent mention of Miss Ward's former success in connection with a criticism of her latest work. The two plays are very similar, particularly in the lesson to be derived from their exposition. "Innocent" is a drama that will live through the annals of dramatics on the screen. It strikes deep—deep into the inner recesses of humanity's soul and arouses compassion—compassion for those whom we seek only to protect from our own kind.

George Fitzmaurice's direction of this production is entitled to special mention. Honorary mention best describes his due. Where pretense would have detracted, he has modestly clung to simplicity. When the lavish in sets was required he responded with the ideal. His opening scenes, laid in China, spell China and the Chinese in capitals. He did not emphasize the Orient with crowds of Orientals when this procedure would have been superfluous. He shows one set—the Chinese home of an American in China. This suffices. When the action turns to Paris, Paris it is. Artificiality of the gambling life, the palatial homes of the indigent rich and beautiful country estates of the wealthy—all are conveyed with realism.

The sub-titles are examples of explanatories. The risque is brought out with a subtle ingenuity that conveys without offending. The photography is the work of one who knows how. John Miltern gives one of the Class A characterizations. Armand Kalitz, as the young Frenchman, without morals, is an excellent type and a good actor. Frederick Perry registers in a less important role. "Innocent" is compared to "The Cheat;" Miss Ward in her first picture for Pathe, does a truly artistic work. It registers from title to finale. The exhibitor takes no chance.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

The opening scenes are laid in China. Innocent (Fannie Ward) is reared within the walls of a Chinese garden. Her father, addicted to drink, dies a drunkard. He leaves her to the protection of John Wyndham (John Miltern). Wyndham tires of the Orient and longs for the gambling resorts of Paris. He goes to Paris accompanied by Innocent. She is established in a beautiful home. Wyndham's former friends cannot understand Wyndham's position with the girl. Louis Doucet (Armand Kalitz), proprietor of a famous gambling resort, is particularly anxious to solve the problem, as he loves the girl at first sight.

Wyndham tries hard to fight the passion for gambling, but finally gives way and spends night after night in Doucet's gambling resort. Doucet takes advantage of his absence and visits Innocent. He flatters her and she becomes infatuated with him. Wyndham returns one night and finds Doucet in company with Innocent. He realizes the danger facing Innocent.

He takes her from Paris to the country. Doucet learns that she has gone and follows. He meets her and takes her to Paris, where he buys her beautiful clothes. Wyndham wakes to the realization that he is in love with Innocent. He (Wyndham) asks her to marry him. She laughs and tells him he is foolish. Later Innocent elopes with Doucet to Paris. Wyndham finds himself alone in the big house and broods. He follows Innocent to Paris. Innocent and Doucet reach Paris and Doucet puts off the marriage ceremony. Innocent insists, and he, becoming enraged because he has not conquerred her, attacks her and is killed by Wyndham who comes upon the scene. He leaves for China. Innocent, aware of the danger which she has escaped and realizing that Wyndham is a true friend, returns to China and Wyndham and she are united.

"The Menace"

(Vitagraph—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Joseph L. Kelley

CORINNE GRIFFITH and Evart Overton are co-starred in this late offering of Vitagraph, from the pen of Rex Taylor and produced under the direction of John Robertson. A distinct vein of mystery runs through Mr. Taylor's work that is given just enough prominence in the screen version to get the attention of an audience at the introduction and hold it throughout the run. Director Robertson selected a number of fine exteriors and with these as a background for the action of the story, he has given the screen a mystery-drama that will stand up under the scrutiny of the average picture-going audience The story is told in a smooth, logical manner and the events are depicted in proper sequence. From a strictly dramatic standpoint, it offers a number of situations that may be said to reach the high spots. Good photography is evident throughout the run and the interior sets have been appropriately selected for proper atmosphere and are in keeping with the condition of affluence which an audience is lead to believe exists in the lives of the principal characters.

The types which the director has selected to impersonate the author's characters are replica of the images of the characters which an audience would picture in its minds. Miss Griffith is at no time during the run, called upon to interpret strong, emotional acting. She does best in the lighter roles. Evart Overton presents his part with appreciation, convinces in every scene but never reaches unusual heights in dramatic action. Ned Finley in the heavy character role, gives one of his best impersonations. Herbert Prior, although not prominently casted, gives a good account of himself while before the camera. Lelia Blow and Frank A. Ford present minor roles convincingly.

The mystery element in this production is its strongest point of interest. It stands up to the end and holds the attention. At no time during the run does the picture drag, but presents a smoothness of purpose that speaks in high terms for the scenarioist. The work of Director Robertson is commendable.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Richard Burnell (Evart Overton) is the adopted child of Dr. (Herbert Prior) and Mrs. Burnell (Lelia Blow). When a baby Richard was taken from an orphan asylum. He has been reared as Dr. Burnell's own child. On leaving college he asks Virginia Denton (Corinne Griffith), daughter of an old Virginia family, to marry him. The wedding day is set. A few days before the day, he meets Morgan (Ned Finley), who has just completed a long term in prison. Morgan visits an old friend and is told that his child had been adopted by the Burnells shortly after he was sentenced to prison. Morgan thinks of a scheme and visits the Burnell home, finds Richard and tells him that he is his father.

A few days prior to the wedding a series of receptions are held for the engaged couple and during the festivities Morgan persuades Richard by threatening to expose his identity to assist him in rifling the safes of the homes at which the receptions are being held. Richard does so, and it is during the night that Morgan attempts to rifle the safe of Virginia's home that she detects him and her fiance doing the job. She breaks the engagement, and Richard's stepfather, knowing that Richard's father is a crook, thinks that the curse is hereditary and believes that Richard is committing burglary.

Richard frames Morgan and he is detected robbing a home. Morgan is arrested and it develops that Richard is not his son, but is the son of the Burnells who thought their child had been killed.

"Molly, Go Get 'Em"

(Mutual-American—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Lisle M. Albright

IN "Molly Go Get 'Em," Margarita Fischer takes unto herself the role of a hoydenish little girl, who is forever getting into scrapes and gumming up the love affairs of her elder sister. While fairly good in a number of ways, there is nothing about the play demanding that it be classed as more than a mediocre production.

The story seems to have been put together merely to afford Miss Fischer an opportunity to portray the spoiled and vivacious young harum-scarum, who hadn't made her debut in society yet, but who couldn't see why that should prevent her from going to parties and enjoying a general good time.

Though Miss Fischer hops, skips and jumps through the entire performance, climbs out of bed-room windows and gives an imitation of a female Douglas Fairbanks, for an audience wishing light entertainment, "Molly Go Get 'Em" will probably be found satisfactory. The photography is fine and there are a number of pretty settings. Lloyd Ingraham directed the production, and Jack Mower, Hal Clements, Margaret Allen, David Howard and True Boardman make up a well balanced cast.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Molly Allison (Margarita Fischer) is compelled to remain in the background until her older sister, Julia (Margaret Allen), has captured a husband. Count Renaud (True Boardman), in reality a French cook, is a suitor for Julia's hand, as an easy way to get a strangle hold on the Allison fortune. After acquiring a release from a bread-and-water diet for misbehavior, Molly arrives on the scene just in time to smite the Count with her vivacious charms. She, however, cures him of any interest in her by telling him that she is the daughter of an Indian squaw, and is subject to fits, and is allowed to remain in the Allison family only because of kindness of her adopted father.

A burglar robs the Allison home, taking Julia's famous pearl necklace. Molly discovers the robber at work, follows him, and with the aid of Billy Wilcox, her sweetheart, holds up the thief and his pal while they are dividing the plunder. When unmasked, one of the robbers proves to be the bogus Count. Julia is prostrated, but Molly rides off with Billy in his eight-cylinder motor-car to look up the nearest minister.

"Madam Spy"

(Universal—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Joseph L. Kelley

JACK MULHALL makes his initial bow to the motion picture public as a female impersonator in "Madam Spy," written by Lee Morrison, scenarioized by Harvey Gates and produced for Universal under the direction of Douglas Gerrard.

For approximately three of the five reels that go to make for this production, Mr. Mulhall masquerades in the guise of a female German spy and if it were not for the fact that he burlesques the part, he would have registered a fine attempt, if not a complete victory. The manner in which the author has fashioned his plot, obviates all possibility of Mr. Mulhall deceiving an audience. A work of this nature must be, of necessity, given subtle treatment and this fact has not been given proper consideration by the author. There are spots in the story where Mr. Morrison has stretched a point in order that he might create enough dramatic material for five reels of pictures and in doing so he has given rise to the farcical where true intent on the part of story and characters might be expected.

The novelty of seeing Mr. Mulhall in the role of a female spy will counteract much that may be said in adverse criticism of this production. The title is catchy and arouses a certain curiosity that will seek satisfaction. The opening scenes and the general impression that is left by the introduction arouses anything but a suggestion of the burlesque that is to follow when Mr. Mulhall attempts the role of the Baroness von Ornstroff. It is difficult to imagine any audience being convinced that the gang of German spies who are expecting the arrival of their confederate from Germany, are fooled by the disguise and actions of Mr. Mulhall. The story is meant to carry a serious impression but this is lost in the burlesque which follows.

The first two reels offer good, sound dramatic entertainment. This can not be said of the latter reels. As a whole the picture will get over if an audience can forgive the sacrifices of the serious for the burlesque and except it as a comedy-drama. Mr. Mulhall does exceptionally good, considering the impossible predicaments into which he is thrown in the enactment of the title role. Donna Drew in the principal feminine role, leaves a fine impression and presents a pretty picture. Wadsworth Harris, Jean Hersholt, Claire Du Brey and George Gebhart are in support. The Photograph is standard work.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Robert Wesley (Jack Mulhall), son of Admiral Wesley (Wadworth Harris), has completed his term at Annapolis, but has yet to hear whether or not he has passed his final examinations. He arrives home and is congratulated by his father and sister. His sweetheart, Phyllis Covington (Donna Drew), is present to greet him. The next day after his arrival, Admiral Wesley receives a telegram informing him that his son has failed to pass his examinations.

Robert is severely reprimanded and goes to his father's study to reflect. He sits down and hears someone enter the room. Suspecting mischief, he remains quiet and discovers that the butler, Hanson (George Gebhart), is searching for something in his father's desk. Another man enters and Hanson, using a skeleton key, obtains access to his father's desk and takes therefrom certain naval department plans. The stranger tells Hanson that Baroness von Hulda is expected to arrive at Baltimore on a certain liner.

Robert hears the instructions and gets the pass-word by which the Baroness is to be greeted. He decides to act. He leaves hastily and goes to Baltimore, meets the Baroness, and, telling her that he is escorting her to her German friends, secretly takes her to the home of an old professor he knew at school and has her confined as a prisoner. He then gets the Baroness's trunks, arrays himself in her clothes, and after a number of exciting adventures with the German spies he succeeds in trapping the gang and winning the admiration and respect of his father, friends and country.

Two Strand Comedies

"BURGLARS" and "A Peach and a Pill" are the latest Strand releases featuring Billie Rhodes and Cullen Landis, and in both Billie Rhodes makes a decided hit. Some really unique situations are provided in each reel, and Billie, as ever, is equal to the occasion. "Burglars" is based on an invitation being sent to Mary (Billie Rhodes) and Jack (Cullen Landis) by the aunt of Mary and uncle of Jack, to visit them at their country home. Owing to delayed taxi trip to the depot, the niece is first missed and later the nephew. Incidentally both decide to find their own way to the uncle's house which address they have, and here is where the ludicrous complications occur. Not expecting each other, and finding the house empty, they enter by a window—at different times, of course—and hearing each other in different parts of the house and then catching a glimpse of each other, they become alarmed and turn in a burglar alarm. Both are arrested and only the timely arrival of uncle and aunt prevent disastrous results. "A Peach and a Pill" is just as full of amusing incidents. Both will be well received anywhere.

"Girls You Know"

(Edison-Perfection—One Reel)

Reviewed by Lisle M. Albright

AT last the cry of the exhibitor for a series of short, high-class comedies has been answered—and answered so well that a new high water mark for single reelers has been established. Made at the Edison studios, and produced under the personal direction and supervision of James Montgomery Flagg, the artist, these twelve comedies, under the general title of "Girls You Know," are simply in a class by themselves. Each one is an irresistible social satire, featuring some particular type of attractive American girl that Mr. Flagg has used in his illustrations and sketches.

Each comedy is a mirth provoker of the highest order, the subtitles, in themselves, being of sufficient power to pull repeated outbursts from the most phlegmatic of individuals. Mr. Flagg wrote the scenarios himself and appears in each production.

"The Bride" is the title of the second of the series. It is a take-off on the bride's preparations for the wedding, the ceremony itself and the honeymoon. No one can see the picture without enjoying it. The series undoubtedly will appeal to the higher class patrons as the comedies are free of slap-stick and depend for their strength on broad, keen, but good-natured satire.

Wetzel, known in Winamac for the past year or so as its band director. He is starting a show schedule of Monday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights, with Universal programs.

Manager Rogers of Crump's theatre, Decatur, let the contracts for 300 more seats to be placed in the theatre. He finds that the seating capacity of the upstairs is hardly ever sufficient to accommodate the crowds, and in order to relieve the congestion, the seats will be added.

Save Current—and Improve Your Projection

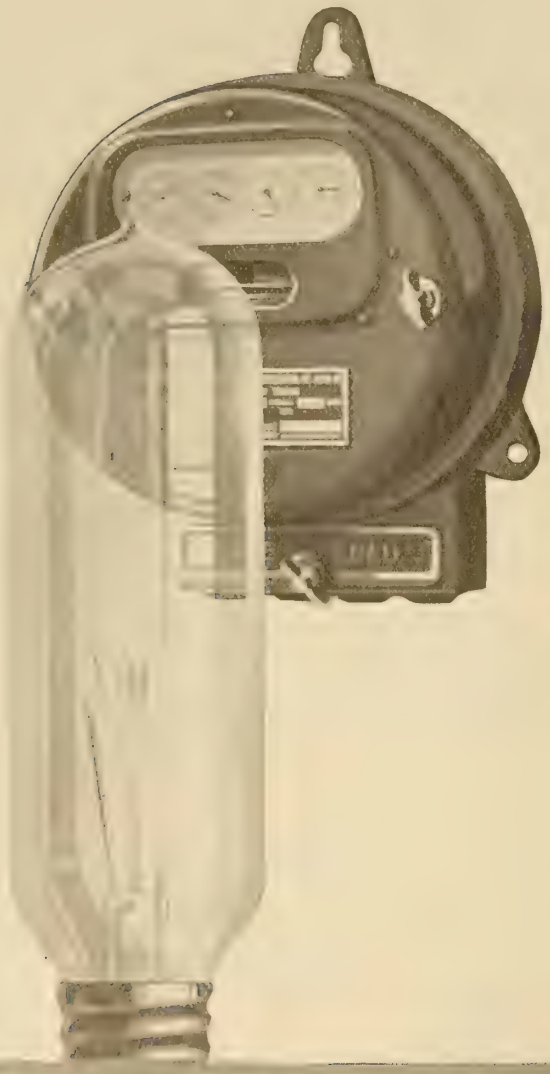

Figure 600 watts per hour against your present current consumption. That tells you something of what NATIONAL MAZDA lamps will save you in projection cost. But it tells only part. Add to this saving several dollars a month of repair expense, total elimination of carbon-jaw breakage, and a considerable reduction in damage to condensing lenses. Against these savings is—what? Only the cost of rebuilding your apparatus to accommodate the lamps. This expense comes once. The savings are continuous. The preliminary expense will be repaid to you out of the savings in a few months, and after that the savings are net profit. And besides—and most important—incandescent lighting BETTERS THE PICTURES. The light is without flicker, and the lamp once focused requires no further attention. Full information from your nearest supply house or from Nela Specialties Division, National Lamp Works of General Electric Co., 109 Nela Park, Cleveland, Ohio.

Exchanges Co-operate with N. A. M. L.

THE following letters have been received from independent exchanges and show the desire on the part of the film distributors to co-operate with the National Anti-Misframe League. These letters are only part of those which we have received. Others will be published in future issues.

From what we can learn throughout the field there is no doubt that members of the National Anti-Misframe League are doing all in their power to co-operate with and help the exchanges to the end that film in better condition may be shown to the public, thus increasing picture theatre patronage.

The following letters speak for themselves:

QUEEN FEATURE SERVICE
Birmingham, Ala.
December 29, 1917.

Mr. E. K. Gillett,
Motion Picture News,
729 Seventh Avenue,
New York City.

Dear Sir: Replying to your letter of the 24th, we think that the National Anti-Misframe League is a great step forward, and we are of course more than willing to co-operate at all times with any movement that will help eliminate the mishandling of film.

We have competent inspectors to inspect each and every reel that leaves our exchange, and we do all in our power to give our customers film in good condition and without misframes. You must realize, however, that to locate misframes is a difficult matter unless the picture is screened, and we would suggest that operators whenever possible mark the misframes so that the inspector's attention will be called to them. Another matter that should be called to the attention of the League is the replacing of bands on all reels before shipping. We often have a five-reel feature come back without a band on it and with the film all loose in the can, causing the film to be seriously damaged and scratched.

We will be glad to hear from you at all times regarding the progress of the League.

Yours for service,
QUEEN FEATURE SERVICE.
Doc Graham, Manager.

New York City.

Dear Sir: Your letter of December 31 received, calling our attention to the National Anti-Misframe League which was started by the MOTION PICTURE NEWS.

The writer can assure you that he is only too glad to become a member of the National Anti-Misframe League, and will do everything in his power to see that no films are sent from this exchange that have not been thoroughly inspected, and that the misframes have all been taken out of the film.

Best wishes for a prosperous year, we are,

Very truly yours,

Gentlemen: Replying to your circular letter under date of December 27, with reference to the National Anti-Misframe League pledge. Personally, I think this is one of the best steps forward in the motion picture business, that is in taking care of our films. Anything I can do to help the good cause along, I would be more than pleased to do so. The League has my heartiest endorsement, and I will in every way work to help make the organization a success.

Yours very truly,

Gentlemen: Replying to yours of the 26th, in regard to the National Anti-Misframe League; you ask for an opinion from me as a manager of an exchange, and from my viewpoint, no misframes are made at the exchange, and when the operator is compelled to make a patch, he must remember that his brother operator ahead of him is the one who has caused this extra work.

It is practically impossible for an exchange inspector to locate misframes and inspect any quantity of reels.

We suggest that the operators insert a scrap of paper in the reel where there is a misframe and in this way our inspectors can locate and correct the fault.

If the operators would put a note in the can, giving us details as to the complaints they have to make, it would enable us to correct any errors.

Unless the operators will take the trouble to give this information it is almost impossible for an exchange to catch the poor films as they can't see reels every time they come in, or at all for that matter, after they have once been released, and are likely to run cut up prints long after they should be out of service.

Thanking you for your letter, and with best wishes for your success, I am,

Very truly yours,

These letters contain suggestions which every operator and theatre manager should study carefully as they are of the greatest importance.

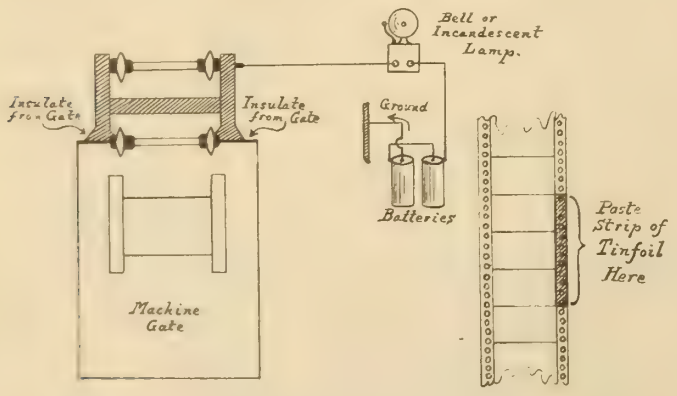
Equipment Operating — Projection — Questions Answered

Another Change-Over Signal



Messrs. W. S. Croft and J. O. Bradley, Kansas City, Mo., submit the following:

"WE note in your sheet under date of December 29, 1917, a sketch of an automatic change-over signal submitted by the Society of M. P. E. which we think is a little deep for us small town boys, so we are enclosing you a sketch of a device we have been using for the last year, and which can be made (by any magic lantern operator that is not bone from the neck up) in about ten minutes. If this misses the wastebasket pass it to the rest of the natives.

"Before closing will say that we use a Magnet Dowser to change over, also arc controls made by old Pop Standfort (one of the old school) which have not been put on the market yet. Now if any of the boys have a device to thread up pass it along as Brother Bradley has the gout and he would sure appreciate same."

Comment: Those of our readers and correspondents who have written in requesting us to describe something good, practical or simple in the line of a change-over signal, must surely have a wealth of suggestions to act upon now, because we have described three mechanical, or electro-mechanical, change-over devices and, in addition, the method suggested by the Society of Motion Picture Engineers, which latter consists in ending each reel of a multiple-reeler with a sub-title and commencing the ensuing reel with the same sub-title, so that the two identical sub-titles can be superimposed on the screen at the instant when changing over.

In this connection it looks as though the correspondents have gotten the suggestion of the Engineers confused with our "automatic change-over signal," described and illustrated in the Projection Department of December 29, 1917, page 4602. The mechanical device there illustrated will not be found difficult to construct, but for simplicity the present scheme of Messrs. Croft and Bradley has the upper hand.

Referring to the appended diagram of the Croft and Bradley indicator, it will be seen that above the customary guide-roller at the top of the film gate (Power's Machine presumably) is mounted another metal guide-roller, the latter being thoroughly insulated from the mechanism. The metal spindle upon which this upper guide-roller is mounted is connected by a wire to a bell or conveniently located incandescent lamp. A wire is then run from the other terminal of the bell (or lamp) to two dry-batteries connected in series, and a wire from the remaining battery terminal is grounded in any suitable fashion.

A narrow strip of tinfoil is then pasted along one edge of the film at any desired place (for change-over signaling near the end of the reel), and when this strip of tinfoil passes over the upper guide-roller the circuit is momentarily closed and the bell rings. This method shares with our proposed device the advantage of being able to operate the signal at any desired point in the length of the film, and the bell may be made to ring for any requisite length of time by increasing the length of the strip of tinfoil attached to the film. It might, at first glance, be thought that pasting a strip of tinfoil over the perforations would cause the film to ride the sprocket, but with most of the available tinfoil, which is very thin, the sprocket teeth will have no trouble in penetrating it, while in the case of heavier tinfoil, the foil could be pricked through with a pin at the center of each sprocket hole preparatory to running the film for the first time after attaching the tinfoil. As the tinfoil has no great affinity for the base or the emulsion of cinefilm, it is easy to remove these strips after the day's run.

Omaha Exchange Manager Replies

Mr. J. H. Calvert, manager, Laemmle Film Service, Omaha, Nebraska, writes:

"IT was indeed a pleasure to receive your letter of January 5, saying that your attention had been called to a film that was badly punch-marked. This is a condition that has existed for many years in the Omaha territory, owing to the fact that the operators in the small towns are very careless about our titles and leaders, and a great many times the title is broken in two, and unless our numbers are punched through the film in several places we are unable to determine what the reel number is, which, of course, is very confusing to us.

"I presume that you received this complaint from the Anti-Misframe League of Sioux City, who have taken the matter up with me several times, and I have issued instructions to our Inspection Department that in the future they should be very careful in the numbering of their reels. I don't believe that the Sioux City boys will have any complaint to make in the near future.

"I belong to Local No 343, Omaha, Nebraska, and spent five years of my life in a booth, and I realize and appreciate the difficulties. A great deal of the fault we find is with the small town exhibitor, by that I don't mean a town that supports a local, but I mean the individual in the small town, whose machine only carries one reel. It is always a great delight to those small town men to try and duplicate city ideas—chances are he has one good machine and one old rattle-trap head standing in his booth. In order to make his change-overs right, he will punchmark the films to eliminate showing 'End of Part One' and start of 'Part Two.'

"I have taken out fully a hundred of these punch-marked scenes since I have been manager of the Omaha office, which is only thirty days. I am enclosing a sample.

"I wish to heartily co-operate with you and the National Anti-Misframe League. It is a waste of film and from causes that should be stopped. If I can be of any assistance I am only too ready to do so."

Comment: This letter is in reply to one we addressed to Mr. Calvert setting forth the complaints of a Sioux City correspondent with regard to the stencil marking of films by Omaha exchanges, and the failure of the exchange managers to reply to letters of complaint received from their customers.

The fact that the exchange manager replies to our letter might indicate that the letters of exhibitors and operators would also be replied to if they were couched in temperate language, but Mr. Calvert's letter to us may be taken as a letter, or declaration, to all of his customers, and we therefore thank him, on behalf of the League members in his territory, for the courtesy of his reply and for his promise to assist the N. A. M. L. and its members in improving the appearance and physical condition of films.

It is true, as Mr. Calvert says, that the small town exhibitor tries to ape the methods of his city brother, but so long as he does not perpetrate damage upon the films he must be encouraged in his efforts to "present" his pictures, because out of a small town came the genius Rothapfel, and it may yet be the lot of the "tank towns" to reveal another genius in photoplay presentation.

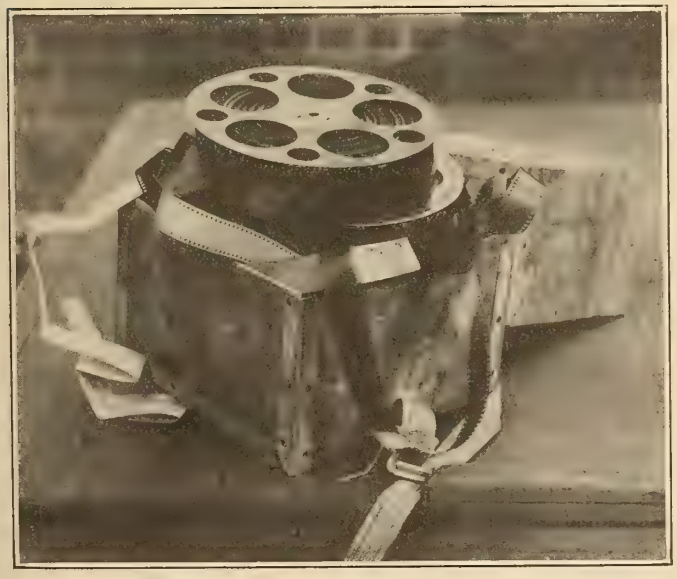
If, however, the small town operators and exhibitors will persist in marking the ends of the reels (as per samples enclosed by Mr. Calvert) the remedy is to give them none but the older films. When they find that they cannot have good pictures unless they will keep them in proper condition, they will abandon the use of the punch and adopt some more professional method of indicating the time to change over from one machine to the next.

We honestly think that the correspondents contention is a little far fetched, that it is impossible to identify a reel returned with the title torn in two, or even altogether missing, without recourse to a lot of numbers stenciled through the film. The only justification for this method of identification is that it is a rapid method, and saves consulting the records, but we request Mr. Calvert, and all other exchange managers, to curtail this mutilation of new and valuable films to the utmost extent possible. Surely, two identification numbers stenciled in each reel should be sufficient, instead of six and eight as has been the practice, and by complying with this request Mr. Calvert will be commencing the fulfillment of his promise to support the ideals of the National Anti-Misframe League.



The letter from Mr. Calvert, reproduced above, will doubtless prove good news to the Sioux City operators, and we hope that they will co-operate with him in his good intentions.

A Severe Case of Mishandled Film

ALTHOUGH the efforts of the National Anti-Misframe League are resulting in increased respect on the part of operators for the films which they receive from the exchanges, there are still many projection men who have not been awakened by the call of progress and the result is that films are still abused in some localities, as exchange men can affrm.

As a recent instance of such carelessness on the part of an operator who, doubtless, does not know that such an organization as the N. A. M. L. exists, the accompanying photograph clearly indicates that the Jewel production, "Come Through," suffered considerably when it was returned in the manner illustrated by the Arena theatre in Astoria, L. I.

Apparently there was no attempt made to rewind the films, and the binder bands were not wrapped around their respective reels, but were, as a matter of fact, found stuffed into a corner of the shipping case.

As a piece of silent evidence this photograph should impress managers and operators with the importance of returning films to the exchange in proper condition. When an operator returns films in the careless manner shown by the accompanying cut, he is perpetrating a severe outrage against the exchange, and such absolute disregard for the property of others can only result in embittering the exchanges against the offenders. We are proud to state that this wanton mishandling of a Jewel production did not occur at the hands of a member of the National Anti-Misframe League, but we would point out for the benefit of the League members, as well as all other operators, that it is a matter of some time and expense on the part of the exchange to provide each film with a reel band, properly marked with the number, name, etc., of each reel.

It is only common courtesy for every operator, at the conclusion of the day's run, to see to it that each reel is wrapped with its proper band, as this facilitates the checking up of incoming reels by the exchange. The most important function of the reel-band, however, is the protection of the film which it encases, and it will be readily apparent that when the bands are placed around the reels no such damage can result in transit as is shown in the accompanying illustration.

With regard to rewinding the reels prior to returning to the exchange, this is not a requirement to be insisted upon, because some exchanges prefer to receive the reels with the last part outermost. In the case of theatres which put their shows on 2,000 foot reels, the films will be rewound with the beginning of each reel outermost in the natural course of transferring them back to the small reels which they came on.

Wants to Rewind Economizer

Clayton Flint, Delhi, N. Y., writes: "I am using a Hallberg economizer on 120 volt line and getting 30 amperes at the arc, and the line is fused for 60 amperes. At that I have the economizer connected on the 115 tap and would like to get more amperage. How would I go to work to fix up my secondary coil to get more amperage for my throw, which is 80 feet? Kindly tell me what size and kind of wire to use and give a drawing on how to fix it so I can cut out or hook up the coil to get the desired results and how many coils to cut out and just how to go at it."

In Reply: Upon considering the data furnished by the correspondent, it would seem that he has the 30-40 ampere Hallberg economizer known as the regular type. He is, therefore, fused unnecessarily heavy on the line side as only a 20 ampere fuse is required with this transformer.

As the correspondent is doubtless aware, there are four leads, or taps, on the line side of the Hallberg economizers and one of these leads is always to be attached to one side of the line or source of supply. Of the remaining three taps, the one nearest to the constant line lead is the one to connect to the other side of the supply when the highest available amperage is desired. The action of this tap, when the line is connected thereto, is to automatically cut out a few turns of the primary coil, which is calculated to have the effect of increasing the secondary voltage with a consequent increase in amperage at the arc.

In this way the maximum amperage (about 40) which the correspondent's particular type of transformer can deliver should be available at the arc, and if he is sure that he is not getting this much current he should have the transformer looked over by the makers. As we recently stated in connection with the subject of rewinding motor-generator sets, this is a proposition for the maker of the device in question, and we do not recommend the rewinding of generators or transformers by operators, except in rare instances where they have had special experience along such lines.

If, upon investigation, it is found that the correspondent's transformer is delivering the 40 amperes which it should, and this amount of current does not yield a screen picture of satisfactory brilliancy, the remedy then is to procure a larger transformer of greater capacity, or some other device which will provide illumination of the necessary intensity.

A No-Scrape Film Cement

Mr. G. L. Goldie, Cherokee, Iowa, writes:

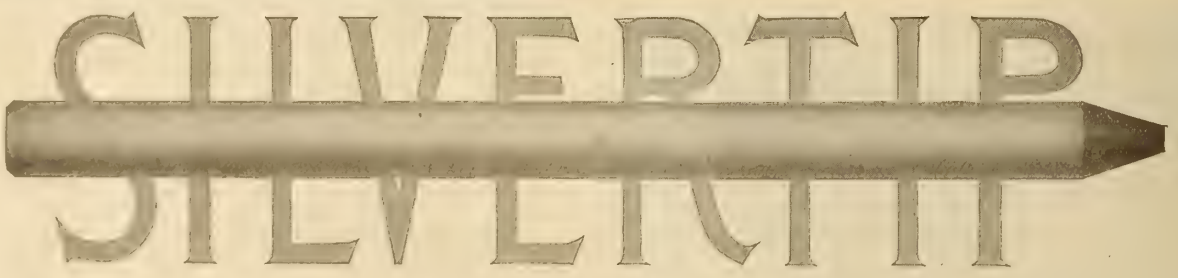
"I AM enclosing circulars descriptive of a film cement that I have been using for over a year in the operating-room. I have run up against so many fake film cements that I went to work on one myself, and I will say that I have got a cement that is as fine as can be made. I am putting it on the market knowing that it will do what I claim, and if any operator or film exchange has trouble with film cement they will find that by using this cement their troubles will cease.

"A bottle is being sent you for inspection and test. You will note that you can splice or patch a film without scraping the emulsion off, and the cement also dries quickly. The ingredients are not to be found in other film cements, excepting one ingredient and you are probably familiar with the odor. The cement makes its weld by a chemical reaction in the film itself—by that I mean certain chemicals are freed by the chemicals in the cement. It practically makes a new coat over the patch. Take a small brush and brush some of it over the face of a film and notice the effect it has on the emulsion. I claim it is even better than the cement the studios use in their laboratories. I would like to have your opinion of this film cement, and I might also state that I have made a thorough study of chemistry and this has helped me wonderfully."

Comment: Upon receipt of the sample bottle of cement forwarded by Mr. Goldie we proceeded to put the same to a test. It is true that films can be joined with this preparation without removing the emulsion, and a join so made will resist a greater strain than it would ever be subjected to in a projecting machine without pulling apart. By the application of sufficient pressure, however, the patch made without scraping can be pulled apart at the point of junction, although when the join is made in the proper way, by scraping away the emulsion from one of the ends of the film to be joined, the splice is equal in permanency to joins made with other cements of good quality, and if it is attempted to pull such a join apart the film will more likely be ruptured at some other place than at the splice.

In spite of the novelty of being able to make a splice without scraping away the emulsion, we must protest against such practice, because the result is a join of undue thickness, altogether lacking in pliability. This, as can readily be appreciated, will soon cause the breaking down of the sprocket holes following the splice, because a stiff or heavy join will not pass over the sprockets without considerable friction as we have previously demonstrated in a special article.

Mr. Goldie's film cement is of satisfactory quality, however, and when used in the proper way would doubtless prove satisfactory to any exchange or operator. He states that the price is 50 cents for a one-ounce bottle, and the same may be ordered by addressing him P. O. Box 384, Cherokee, Iowa.



The Fidelity Motor for Motion Picture Projectors

THERE are frequent demands for a small variable speed motor, suitable for running a motion picture projector, and we note what seems to be a useful motor of this type in the 1918 Bulletin of the Fidelity Electric Company, 331-337 North Arch street, Lancaster, Pa.

This small one-eighth horse power Fidelity Motor has a speed regulator giving a range in excess of 50 per cent of the rated speed of the motor and is provided with a small grooved pulley. Connection is made to two binding posts located at the base. The motor is supplied in both A. C. and D. C. models, the only difference being that the speed regulator of the D. C. motor is located on the base instead of connected to the brushes as is customary in the case of A. C. motors.

Local 236 Elects Officers

MR. F. K. DE HANEY, Secretary of Local 236, of Birmingham, Ala., advises that at a recent meeting of that organization the following officers were elected: President, R. L. Rollings; vice-president, J. Halfacre; recording secretary, W. C. Alexander; secretary and treasurer, J. T. Amhertson; business agent, C. J. Heck; sergeant-at-arms, F. Mankin, and presiding secretary, Mr. De Haney.

FOR THE PROJECTION OF ART FILMS

To project clearly the present day Art Film, an exceedingly high current must be carried by the projector carbons. The Silvertip was designed to keep pace with the advance of photography, which made possible the Art Film, and so is heavily plated and can carry the heaviest current without harmful heating. In order to eliminate the flicker it was designed with a small diameter as this holds the arc steady and insures perfect screen definition.

These exceptional features have helped make Silvertips the standard negative projector carbons.

Note—Silvertip Carbons are to be used for Direct Current only.

FOR ALTERNATING CURRENT

The White A. C. Special Carbon gives a pure white, noiseless light and has successfully solved the problem of projection with alternating current.

Pledge

AS a motion picture operator who has the interest of his profession at heart and is willing to assist in eliminatng some of the evils practised in the operating-room, I promise that I will to the best of my ability return films to the exchange in first-class condition. Furthermore, I will when it becomes necessary remedy all misframes, bad patches, etc., that may be in the film which I receive and in this way co-operate with my brother operators and give greater pleasure to those who make up the motion picture audience by showing films that are free from such defects. I also promise that I will not make punch marks in film, and when film is received by me, with punch holes, I will notify the exchange to that effect so that they may use their efforts to correct this evil.

ASIDE from the gratification which the members of the National Anti-Misframe League feel, in being able to improve the condition of films, and consequently add to the pleasure of all picture-goers, there is another reward for faithful adherence to the League's policies, and that is the respect and friendship of the operator's employer. An instance of this is revealed by the following unsolicited letter from Charles N. Sloane who is the Iowa representative of the Allen Film Corporation. Mr. Sloane says:

"I would like to say a word in regard to one of the members of your National Anti-Misframe League—one Philip Frahme—who is located at the Dyme theatre, Lake Mills, Ia. I am managing the Iowa print of the Allen Film Corporation Picture, 'The Garden of Allah,' and last season I had 'Civilization' in Illinois. I have met all kinds of operators but I think that Mr. Frahme is about the best I've struck in many a day. He has a Power's 6A which looks and runs as if it had just come out of the factory, although it is over a year old. His projection is about as near perfect as you can find, and he is sure a 'nut' on keeping film in good condition. My print is nearly new but he insists on going over it after each night's show. A few more operators like Mr. Frahme would sure make life easy for exchanges and for us men with state rights features. More power to your League if this is what you are doing. Keep it up and we will give you a vote of thanks."

SPEER ALTERNO CARBONS

Perfect Projection Immovable Arc
Noiseless Operation Brilliant Illumination

A bright, flickerless, eye-resting light
No changes required in booth equipment

By the adoption of special materials, both in the body of the carbon and the core, the Speer Carbon Company is able to offer to the exhibitor and operator a carbon with intensely bright, white light producing qualities. The illuminating qualities of the SPEER "ALTERNO" CARBONS bring out the minute details of the film and yet have a most pleasing effect on the eye.

The operators' difficulties, which included a wandering light, ghosts in the picture, sputtering of the arc, and a noise almost intolerable, have all been relegated to by-gone days. This entire condition has been changed by the introduction of the SPEER "ALTERNO" NOISELESS CARBONS for alternating current.

The exceptional advantages and possibilities now afforded for alternating current counteract the arguments formerly used for the installation of elaborate and expensive apparatus for the changing of alternating current to direct.

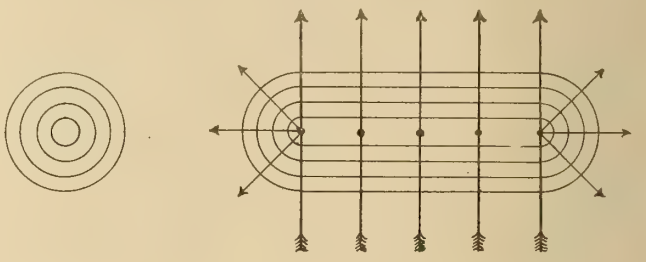
Chapters on Photographic Optics—III



AS we have seen that the images produced by lenses do not consist of mathematically exact points, but rather of "antipoints" of finite dimensions, it will now be apparent that the quality of definition, or sharpness, of a lens-produced image will be dependent upon the size of the antipoints. If the antipoints of which the entire image is composed are of relatively large diameter, adjacent antipoints will overlap one another, causing confusion or lack of definition in the image and rendering impossible the reproduction of fine details which are situated close together in the object being photographed.

The differentiation, or distinct and separate reproduction, of fine details in close proximity is known in optics as "resolution," and the measure of the ability of a lens to distinctly reproduce, or separate, delicate details lying in close proximity is termed the resolving power of the objective. It was explained on a former occasion[1] that photographic resolving power was dependent upon "grain," because the silver-bromide grains of a photographic emulsion are of greater magnitude than the antipoints comprising the axial portion of the image produced by a well corrected objective. While photographic resolution is therefore dependent upon the characteristics of photographic emulsions, it will prove valuable to familiarize ourselves with the factors which govern the size of antipoints, for this will show us what is the nearest approach to point imagery that can be realized by the action of light waves through optical systems.

We know that diffraction causes the theoretical image point to expand into an antipoint, and the principal factor which governs the diameter of the antipoint is the diameter or aperture of the lens by which the image is formed. The diameter of the antipoint varies inversely as the aperture of the lens, so we may state that the greater the aperture of an objective the smaller will be the antipoints which it produces, or in other words, the resolving power of objectives increases with increase in angular aperture. This dependence of the size of the diffraction pattern upon the size of the opening through which light proceeds to the focal-plane is the same in the case of ordinary apertures (such as a round hole or a vertical slit) as in the case of a lens, and, as a matter of fact, diffraction even sets a limit upon the sharpness of definition attainable with a pin-hole camera.

As is generally known, the image produced in a pin-hole camera is not sharp because it is composed of the overlapping points of light proceeding from all parts of the object through the pin-hole to the focal-plane. As the pin-hole has appreciable dimensions the points of the object, as reproduced by the pin-hole, will also be of appreciable dimensions, so that instead of having point imagery we have an unsharp picture composed of overlapping discs of sensible width. Now it would appear that by greatly decreasing the width of the pin-hole we would decrease the diameter of the discs of light comprising the image, and that if we made the pin-hole small enough we should be able to secure sharp reproductions. If we start with a fairly large pin-hole, giving a coarse image, and commence substituting smaller and smaller pin-holes, we find that up to a certain limit the picture does become sharper with each decrease in the size of the aperture, but when the pin-hole is made so small that it is only a few wave-lengths in width, diffraction patterns become apparent and the smaller we now make our pin-hole, the larger these diffraction discs become, which of course means the rapid deterioration of the sharpness of the picture. These diffraction discs produced in the pin-hole camera by the use of an excessively small aperture partake of the appearance of antipoints, i.e., they consist of a bright central spot surrounded by alternating bright and dark rings of steadily decreasing intensity.

It will now be inquired: why does decrease in the aperture of an objective cause an increase in the diffraction effect (or size of the antipoint)? It is not easy to illustrate the reasons by means of a geometrical diagram, but it has been explained by Mr. Conrad Beck[2] in a most lucid manner as follows:

"A single particle of ether when caused to vibrate by reason of a light impulse has no greater tendency to communicate its motion in one direction than in another. A stone dropped into water communicates the disturbance in all directions, as shown by the circular waves (Fig. 1*a*) which travel outward from the point of impact, but a row of adjacent stones dropped into the water (Fig. 1*b*) will not form a series of circles arising from each stone. The wave created by one stone has a certain influence on that of its neighbor, and the result is that as far as the central portion of the row of stones is concerned, a straight wave travels outwards and the vibration proceeds in a straight line direction. Such is also the case with light—a body of light travels in straight lines not from any quality of its own, but because each individual ray, although it has a tendency to wander in all directions, is kept in a straight course by the influence of the neighboring rays on all sides. Its endeavors to travel away from a straight direction are frustrated by similar but opposite endeavors on the part of its immediate neighbors, but at the margin of the bundle of rays where on one side no neighbors exist to regulate the conduct of the edge rays, they do not travel in the direct line of propagation only, but send off vibrations in the form of a fan, which is exactly comparable to the manner in which waves are sent out in all directions at the two ends of the row of stones dropped into the water. (Fig. 1*b*.)

"This phenomenon is called diffraction, and the light which does not travel in the direction of propagation is called diffracted light.

"The statement that light travels in straight lines and the conception of diffraction as a supplementary phenomenon is a clumsy and inaccurate method of expressing the case. The facts are more truly stated by saying that light travels in all directions, but that when a sufficient body of light is considered it travels in only one direction, because each individual ray of a bundle is so controlled by its neighbors that all except the margin moves in one direction. In large beams, where there are many elements to regulate the behavior of the community, the relative amount of diffracted light is small, but as the beam is narrowed it rapidliy increases."

As the influence of the size of the lens aperture upon the size of the focussed antipoint has now been explained in the elementary sense, we proceed to the exact determination of resolving power and to the consideration of other factors which Physical Optics shows us impose a definite limit upon the defining power of optical instruments.

We have already seen that wave propagation is subject to the effects of interference. At some points of the wave-front transmitted by a lens the secondary wavelets reinforce one another, while at other points on the wave-front the wavelets interfere and produce no luminous effect. We have also seen that a divergent wave, after passing through a collecting lens, becomes convergent; the function of the lens is to retard the central portion of the incident wave-front and the convergent wave-front thus produced is propagated by reinforcement and interference. The focus is the small area within which all of the secondary wavelets reinforce each other, and this space will always possess a certain magnitude, so that the optical image of a geometrical point will never be a point itself, but will be of finite dimensions. The limits of the focus (or bright center of the antipoint) correspond to the points where the wavelets mutually interfere, and we now proceed to demonstrate the method of calculating the diameter of the central disc of the antipoint, reference being had to Fig 2.

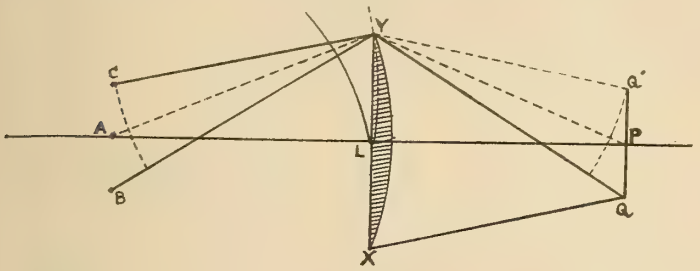

Fig. 2.

In Fig. 2 light waves diverge from a point A, on the axis of the lens X Y, and are brought to a focus in the neighborhood of the point P. We have now to determine the diameter Q Q′ of the image formed. The point Q is found, as was demonstrated last week, from the consideration that interference must occur there due to diffraction of the incident wave-fronts at the edge of the lens mount. It is obvious that the wavelets from X and Y, points on the margin of the lens, are the most capable of interference, since their paths to the focal-plane differ more in length than those of other portions of the same wave-front. Accordingly (Y Q — X Q) must be equal to half a wave-length ($\lambda/2$). We join Y to Q′, and then by symmetry Y Q′ = X Q, and Y Q — Y Q′ = $\lambda/2$. Let L P = v and let L Y = r, while Q Q′ = d. We then have the following relations:

$$\lambda/2d = r/v$$

$$d = v\lambda/2r \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (1)$$

Between the points Q and Q′ all of the secondary wavelets reinforce one another but at Q and Q′ interference commences. Thus, as we saw in the previous installment, Q Q′ represents the brightest part of the image, and outside the points Q and Q′ the illumination rapidly diminishes.

It therefore appears that the diameter (d) of the image (or bright center of the antipoint) is inversely proportional to the aperture of the lens, and this is a result of great importance because it explains, for instance, the advantage possessed by astronomical telescopes of large aperture. A star may be considered as a geometrical point of light, but the image of a star as seen in a telescope will always possess finite dimensions (due to diffraction as previously described) which are diminished by increasing the aperture of the telescope. Two stars may be so close together that when viewed through a small telescope their images overlap, but by using a telescope of greater angular aperture their images are rendered smaller, as the above equation shows, so that they are separated, or resolved, and may be seen distinct from each other.

This brings us to the numerical computation of resolving power which may be readily explained, referring still to Fig. 2.

Let B and C be two luminous points equidistant from, and on opposite sides of, the axis A. P. Now, in order that wave fronts from B and C shall be refracted separately by the lens L, they must arrive at the lens distinct from each other; in other circumstances they would be refracted as one wave-front through the lens and would form a single image. Therefore, if the wave-fronts coincide with one another at the center of the lens (L), they must be about half a wave-length apart at the margin of the lens (Y), or BY — C Y = $\lambda/2$. Let A, a point on the axis midway between B and C, be at a distance u from the lens L, and let the distance between B and C be designated by d'. Then where λ designates the wave-length of the incident light.

$$\lambda/2d' = r/u$$

Upon transposing we have

$$d' = u\lambda/2r \quad \ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots\ldots (2)$$

The diameter of each image (bright center of the antipoint) produced by the lens L will thus be equal to the value for d expressed by equation (1). If, now, we let D represent the resolving power, or distance between the centers of the images of B and C (represented at the focal-plane in Fig. 2 by Q and Q'), and take the magnification of the distance B C by the lens as equal to v/u (customary formula for lens magnification) we have

$$D/d' = v/u$$

or, the resolving power is expressed by

and the images Q and Q' (of the points B and C) will just touch at their edges and will, therefore, be just resolved or distinguishable as separate points in the image.

These results, while not of immediate importance in everyday photography, express the limits of definition of lenses and lens systems, and throw an important light on the theory of the microscope. They prove that for high resolving power a microscope or other optical instrument, must possess an objective of wide angular aperture, and, furthermore, since the distance d' between the nearest points that can be resolved is proportional to the wave-length (λ) of the incident light, it follows from the equation that the resolving power is higher for light of short-wave length than for light of long-wave length, or in other words, a given structure would be better resolved with blue light than with red light. A glance at Fig. 2 also shows at once that if the distance between B and C is sensibly smaller than half a wave-length, it would be impossible for wave-fronts from B and C to arrive at the lens L separate from one another. Therefore, as Helmholtz has shown[3], we can never hope to see any object that is very much smaller than the wave-length of light.

A Useful Description and Analysis of Photographic Developers

THE characteristics and constitution of developing reagents is a subject of interest to most all photographers, and those who go into the chemical aspects of the subject will find much interesting data in an article by Samuel Wein, entitled "Physical and Chemical Characteristics of Photographic Developers."

This article appears in the "American Annual of Photography" for 1918 (pp. 265-273), and the characteristics of each of the numerous well known developers described have been tabulated as follows: commercial name, chemical name, constitutional formula, crystalline formation, melting point, solubility, behavior to alkalies, acids, oxidizing agents and milk enzymes. From this it can be seen that Mr. Wein's article contains much valuable data in classified and readily accessible form.

Mr. Wein who has had extensive experience as a chemist is desirous of entering the employ of some film laboratory, with which work he is acquainted through previous experience. He may be reached by any one requiring a photographic and research chemist at his home address, 1423 Wilkins avenue, Bronx, New York City.

Attractive Calendar Distributed

SWANSON and Nolan, the well known film people of Omaha, Denver and Salt Lake City, are distributing to their friends and business associates this year a remarkably attractive calendar of 1918, the basic charm of which is a reproduction of an oil painting measuring 10 by 14 inches. This original in oil is by Elmer Lewis, who called it "Discretion is the better part of Valor." The subject shows a pair of royal lions, slinking from a forest fire.

Musical Review of Latest Compositions

1—"The King Bee Film Corporation" announces that they intend publishing a series of Waltzes composed by Billy West, which can be performed in any theatre without a music tax. Several of these Waltzes are already placed on the market, and they absolutely prove to be excellent compositions, equally effective for Dance, Concert and Picture Work.

2—"Uncle Sammy is a'Calling You," by J. H. Hall. An inspiring composition in 2/4 Tempo di Marcia, published by the "Quincke" Music Co., Los Angeles, Cal.

3—"La Grace" Piece de Genre, by Bohm. A very melodious number which is well known to the average pianist, splendidly arranged for Orchestra. (Carl Fischer Edition.)

4—"Spirit of America." A Patriotic Patrol, by Zamecnik. "Spirit of America" forms a supreme feature, a great novelty for every program. The number has a clever catchy original melody, and also introduces a medley of Patriotic Airs. (Sam Fox Edition, Cleveland, Ohio.

5—"Sweet Cookie Mine." A sensational Western hit by Clarence M. Jones. A Fox Trot or One Step of exceptional value. (McKinley Music Co.)

6—"The Darktown Strotters Ball." Fox Trot by Shelton Brooks, the composer of the famous and international hit, "Walking the Dog." (Leo Feist Edition.)

8—"That Cabaret in Honolulu Town," by Jack Frost. This composition is an all around favorite and a popular composition of exceptional merit. (Published by Frank K. Root.)

9—"Fifteen Minutes of Laughter and Tears." A double number, in fact and musical intent. Illustrates the two extremes in melodious temperaments. (A) Beautifully defines the lighter or frivolous; (B) Is in a relative minor illustrating the plaintive, which is the most serious requirement of the Photoplay. (J. W. Stern, 102 West 38th St., New York City.)

10—"At the Grasshopper's Hop." A characteristic Two Step equally effective for cornet, street and moving picture work. (Leo Feist Edition.)

11—"Violets Bring Memories," by Brandon. A melodious 4/4 Moderato movement—unusually delightful and most appropriate for love scenes. (Published by Stark Music Co., St. Louis, Mo.)

12—"Hail, America!" (March) "The Rookies" (March), two favorites by Geo. Drumm. These marches have the right tingling swing. They are bound to be heard frequently at a time when out of the great abundance of patriotic marching a process of musical selection of the fittest assures the popularity of such numbers as these by Drumm. (G. Schirmer Edition.)

"WHY KILL A GOOD MOTION PICTURE WITH POOR MUSIC?" ASKS REX BEACH

Motion picture theatre owners all over the world are driving thousands of dollars of business from their houses every week with musical programs unsuited to productions, in the opinion of Rex Beach.

This famous author, whose successful novels, beginning with "The Auction Block," are to be picturized under Mr. Beach's supervision and distributed through Goldwyn, believes that carefully chosen music, not necessarily original but chosen for its suitability to the subject, will account for 25 per cent. of the financial success of a picture.

"Orchestral music," he said recently, "has the same psychological effect on a motion picture audience as band music on marching soldiers. In both cases music is necessary to weld the emotional appeal.

"We all remember the elemental pianist when the motion picture was in the curio stage—how he pounded and thrummed and fought out Civil War battles on his piano keys. He served a purpose, his day is done.

"Succeeding this earnest person was the six-piece orchestra. You know how those fellows passed the evening—overture, waltz, intermission for refreshments, organ selection, a silent wait, orchestra returns and upsets chairs getting adjusted for the popular medley, a little ragtime, organ improvisation and so on to the finish.

"It is very different to-day in an ever-growing number of theatres. Here in New York the 'Strand,' the 'Rialto,' the 'Rivoli,' etc., for instance, employ experts to devise musical settings and have them played by a forty-piece symphony orchestra. That brings almost as many people back the next week as the worth of the picture.

"Motion picture music need not be classical, but it must be appropriate. In a large measure the audience is unconscious of its effect, but the effect is there, and must be taken into account of by the theatre owner who expects to make money."

Joe Morris' Music at the Vanderbilt

THE Vanderbilt, the Majestic and the Park Avenue Hotels cater to a select class of patrons, and so do many of our well known hostelries. Today a first class orchestra is as much of a fixture in them as the waiters in the dining-room. The leaders of these orchestras must have a wide knowledge of classical and popular music and be ready and able to play anything requested. Even the guests at times bring manuscripts of songs and waltzes to the leaders to play; hence the leader must be able to read manuscripts at sight.

The average person who does not get the time to drift in and out of these hotels has an idea that the orchestras and patrons play and enjoy nothing but classical numbers. This is not so, for the other day when the subject of music came up for discussion in the Vanderbilt Hotel, Josef Fejer, the leader, who has been playing at the Vanderbilt for six years, remarked:

"When the Hawaiian craze was on some of the people that came in here couldn't seem to get enough of it, and leaders from other hotels told me they met with the same experience."

"And do guests ever come and ask you to play popular numbers now?" he was asked.

"Yes; but not so much as they did before. They ask for a great deal of classical music. Sometimes I get a bunch of requests for some popular hit that has just become a craze. The other day I had three requests for "There's a Service Flag in Our Home," and I had never heard of the number before. Then quite a few come and ask for "The Missouri Waltz" and the "Blue Rose Waltz," and while these are put out by a popular publisher, you can't call them regular popular numbers, for you can find one of them, and sometimes both, on scores of classical concert programs."

"Don't you keep well supplied with all the popular numbers, Mr. Fejer?"

"I try to, but no one can tell just when a new popular number is coming out, and if I tried to keep a copy of every popular number published I would have to have an entire building in which to stack them. Like all leaders, I aim to keep a stock of the better grade of popular songs, and those that become genuine hits."

Mr. Fejer then told his friends of his experiences with some guests, who compose music and bring it to him for a tryout. And when he had finished he played a new waltz called "Waltz Blanche," written by Mrs. Leonard Thomas, the well-known and popular society woman. Mrs. Thomas is also a leader in the Woman's Suffrage movements, and if she does not stick to her social and civic duties and quit writing pretty waltzes, a few of the professional instrumental composers will have to go some to prevent being forced into the background.

The most interesting bit of gossip that Mr. Fejer handed out during the conversation was the fact that one guest presented him with a check for $1,000 to play several numbers, among which was included a popular song, now one of the big hits of the country. All this goes to show that good popular music has its appeal for the guests of the fashionable hotels as well as for the moving picture theatres and cabarets. So it is up to publishers to see that the leaders and musicians get their numbers in time.

E. M. Wickes.

General Comments

COLLINS and Harlin, the popular phonograph singers, spent two hours learning "Come Along Ma Honey," which is published by The Echo Music Co. And before Collins and Harlin will give up this much time to any song it has to possess more than ordinary merit. "Come Along Ma Honey" has a double melody and is a splendid number for picture houses.

RAY SHERWOOD is now doing special work for Fischer & McCarthy. For a year Sherwood has been covering the moving picture theatres for the Forster Music Co.

JOS. W. STERN & CO. has just issued "Wait for Your Honey Boy." "Billy Boy," by Lester A. Walton and C. Lucky Roberts, is another number that is showing up very well. "Send Back Dear Daddy to Me," by Harry Tenney and Irving Maslof, and "When the Moon Is Shining Somewhere in France," by Private Frederick Rath, are two of Stern's big sellers.

GILBERT AND FRIEDLAND have opened offices in Chicago and next week will play at the Orpheum theatre, where they will feature their latest hit, "Are You from Heaven?"

"WHEN the Yanks Come Marching Home," Billy Jerome's new war hit, is an ideal number for an overture. Jerome reports that leaders and pianists are taking to it just as readily as they did to "Over There."

"THEY Go Wild Over Me" is a big favorite with singers and musicians in the West, and is becoming more so every day.

"HOMEWARD BOUND," Feist's new hit, is beginning to sweep the country. Hundreds of leaders are featuring it, and the public is buying it in large quantities.

"THAIS"

(Goldwyn Production)

(Reviewed on page 594)

IMPORTANT NOTE

The entire Music Score of "Thais" composed by Massenet, as also all extracts of this Opera published in single form for Violin, Piano or any other combination of instruments, are subject to the Music Tax imposed by the various "Societies of Composers, Authors and Publishers."

Only those Orchestras or individual musicians are permitted to play the Original "Thais Music" whose employers are members of one or the various "Societies of Composers, Authors and Publishers," otherwise it means "VIOLATION" of the United States Copyright Law.

A good many of the present Composers and Publishers are not members of any of such Societies, and their compositions and publications can be performed in any part of the world for just "The Purchasing Price."

Our Music Cues have been, and will be, compiled of only "FREE NUMBERS," but in the case of our Super Production "Thais," which is based on the same Libretto of "Thais" for which Massenet composed the music, we were compelled to make an exception—in order to secure the proper musical accompaniment for this picture. We leave it to your own judgment to see whether you are permitted to perform the original "Thais Music."

For all those who are not in possession of such license we call attention to the last page of our "Music Cue," where we have mentioned "Substitutes" for every one restricted by the "Societies of Composers, Authors and Publishers."

Kindly note the above facts, as we will under no circumstances assume the responsibility in case of any violation on your part concerning the Copyright Laws of the United States or the entire world.

WE HAVE WARNED YOU

Grauman Million Dollar Theatre Sets New Mark

LOS ANGELES has another new building of which to be proud in the Grauman million-dollar theatre, which has just been completed. It is located at Third and Broadway, and is a combination of an office building and theatre.

R. H. Arnold Company, contractor and builder for the building, executed one of the most difficult tasks ever put before a builder. Other than completing the entire work of concrete and steel construction in record time, this concern joined and laid the terra cotta on the exterior of the building despite the fact that it ran into many intricate problems. The arched span of 104 feet, on which the balcony is hung, is without precedent, from both an engineering and construction standpoint—one of the most unique pieces of work ever executed anywhere in the country. The entire balcony and mezzanine is suspended from the side and rear walls without supporting columns obstructing the view. Midway between the rear wall and front of the balcony are two immense reinforced concrete columns contained in side walls. Resting on these columns is a gigantic reinforced concrete arch in the shape of a bow, with its members concealed in the ceiling under the balcony and its arching members extending high up just below the balcony floor. Balanced on this arch with their upper ends connecting with the rear wall and their lower ends terminating in the balcony rail are six reinforced cantilevers of the truss construction. The space between the upper and lower members of the cantilevers is utilized as a mezzanine floor with its connecting rest rooms, etc., which are suspended from the balcony construction above. The construction of this type of cantilever trusses in reinforced concrete is something never before attempted on this large scale. The members consist of intricate masses of deformed reinforced rods, and the construction of the form work and the pouring of the concrete involved intricate and difficult detail work and engineering problems, which were successfully worked out and consummated by the contractors.

Grauman Million Dollar Theatre, Los Angeles

The Grauman theatre consists of one balcony, and is so constructed as to make the acoustics perfect. As one enters the portals of this playhouse, two grand staircases are found at either side of a broad approach to the lower floor. These staircases lead to a mezzanine floor, at each end of which may be found an oil painting, life-size, of characters and scenes from Shakespeare. They are extremely well done and correspond strikingly with the rich colors of the purple-rugged floor with its blending gold-colored border. From the mezzanine a grand staircase leads to the balcony proper, where each seat is a choice one. A feature of the balcony is that the projecting room, from where the motion picture is thrown upon the screen, is built into the lower part of the balcony, completely submerging it to a point where it is unobstructive from any position in the entire balcany. In this location, it is possible to throw the picture squarely on the screen instead of at an angle. The theatre contains no boxes.

The general impression that Mr. Martin through his designer, Mr. Woollett, has endeavored to convey is that of the "Temple of Mirth." The walls and the ceilings are of elegant proportions and give the appearance of stability and grandeur. The travertine marble which adorns the walls forms a background of beauty rarely seen in the most palatial structures anywhere in the world. The minor features, such as the organ screen and decorations on the walls, are intended to convey more intimate ideas such as opulence and mirth. The message of the interior is primarily theatrical in harmony with this thought. The principal figure over the proscenium arch is tragedy, but the idea has been to convey the impression of tragedy triumphant. This figure is treated in rich and fascinating colors and stands out as a glittering jewel emerging from the walls of the great stone arch which supports it. This figure in a way is a re-echo in color of the great central lighting feature in the dome.

The dome of the theatre, which is an illusion to the eye in that it seems to be suspended in midair, is easily one of the most featured displays in the playhouse. It appears as a studded mass of precious jewels in the centermost part, the breaks between being covered with platinum and gold leaf. An effect of indescribable grandeur and beauty is produced by throwing hidden lights of a powerful nature on to this center creation of sparkling wonder, producing different effects according to the color of the light thrown from the spotlights. These lighting effects are put into play during the course of the entertainment, and as the audience sits, in silent relaxation, listening to the wonderful pipe organ, which is one of the most modern and expensive in the country, a soft purple shade will blend into that of a crimson or blue, or some other soft color of the rainbow.

There has been an attempt to proclaim this day in which we live. Instead of following ornaments from old Roman and Greek periods, things of interest in our own time have been chosen. An example of this: Bulls' skulls and horns which are used over the balcony are those of the long-horned Texas cattle. The bison of our own Western plains also appears. Some of the paintings on the beams show the revolvers of cowboys, playing cards, and cattle, and the three balls of the pawnshop where the cowboys pawn their things when they need money.

The opening program at the new theatre featured "The Silent Man," the Ince-Artcraft production starring William S. Hart. The orchestra of thirty pieces is directed by Rudolph G. Kopp,

How About The Kids?

Children's trade is good trade for the Moving Picture Exhibitor. If the kids in your neighborhood like your theatre better than your competitor's—you are the man who is going to get the nickels and dimes of the whole family.

What are you going to do for the children? Have you given them any excuse for wanting to come to your theatre in preference to any other? Or don't you want the children's trade—and the trade of the children's families.

CICO CARDS Win the Children

A good many exhibitors have already discovered this fact. When are you going to look into this money making program proposition? If you want the people of your vicinity to keep your house in mind give them the CICO Card Programs each week.

Do not be misled

Lately we have told you of some Simplex installations in the best Theatres of the East; but please don't let this give you the idea that there is anything local about this preference for the Simplex.

Just now we are thinking of three San Francisco Houses—the Progress, the New Mission, and the New Fillmore, of the Kahn & Greenfield Circuit, under the management of Mr. Louis Greenfield—and all Simplex-equipped.

Here we show the Operating Room of the last-named theatre, pronounced by Mr. W. H. Richardson, the Projection Expert, as the finest he had seen.

"THE GUILTY MAN"

By Ruth Helen Davis and Charles Klein. Irvin V. Willat, Director

Supervision of Thomas H. Ince

The Personality in the Motion Picture

A motion picture is a matter of personalities.

It is the work of men and women, not of machines.

Every detail of "The Guilty Man" was contributed by a big personality—A. H. Woods, the great producer; Thomas H. Ince, the noted director; Ruth Helen Davis and Charles Klein, the authors that wrote this story that astounded Broadway.

A Big Idea Produced In a Big Way

Washington's Finest and Largest Photo-Play Theatres

Owned by Harry M Crandall and Associates

are well managed and prosperous—come down and look us over—we'll bear inspection.

As owners of more theatres than any other individual or theatre company in Washington, my associates and myself desire to go on record to all exhibitors, exchangemen and producers, with some undisputed facts—

—no one man or firm in Washington owns eighteen theatres.

—there are not five strictly first-run houses in the downtown section of Washington.

We Have Never Been Bull-dozed by a Producer or an Exchange nor have we ever bull-dozed an exchange or producer.

—we have been oversold at times, but we have also been undersold

—we have always obtained fair adjustments from the exchange whenever we sought them.

—we use the following pictures—Artcraft, Paramount, Select, Goldwyn, Metro, World, Vitagraph, and the prestige of such productions assures our exclusive standing.

This plain statement of facts should forever lay at rest all misleading notices that have been printed regarding the Washington situation.

"WITHIN THE LAW"

"All over the circuit wherever we played 'Within the Law' we did exceptionally good business and we can heartily recommend this subject as one of the big drawing cards of the season."

TURNER & DAHNKEN CIRCUIT
San Francisco, Cal.

"'Within the Law' proved the greatest attraction from a financial point that I have ever shown in my theatre, notwithstanding the fact that we charged a price double that of any price ever charged for a special at this theatre."

BROADWAY THEATRE
Newburgh, N. Y.

"'Within the Law' is the only picture that I have been able to charge an admission price of 50c. for this season, and I have played most of the big productions. When I played it on a return engagement, we did a bigger business to the day than on the first run."

THE RIALTO
Columbia, S. Car.

"'Within the Law' made more money for us than any other picture that we have played in the last year or two."

A MONEY MAKING MESSAGE!

Ludwig Schwager, Bohemian Annex Theatre, 321-325 East 73rd St., New York City, says:-

"'The Fighting Trail' broke all previous records for serials at our theatre. Then along came 'Vengeance—and the Woman' and broke all records. Each succeeding episode played to larger box-office receipts, the daily average exceeding record for any other serial by $70.00."

THE DOLLARS PILED UP by

"VENGEANCE—AND THE WOMAN"

Jay Emanuel, Jefferson and Park Theatres, Philadelphia, Pa., says:-

"'Vengeance—and the Woman' broke all records. First chapter played to 1,298 children for matinee, in spite of big competition. Usual number of children played to on that day, between two and five hundred. You can appreciate my feelings for 'Vengeance—and the Woman' which I rebooked for my other house, the Park, four blocks away—something I have never done before."

PLACE IT AT THE VERY PEAK OF ALL SERIALS

15 EPISODES by ALBERT E. SMITH and CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

DIRECTED by WILLIAM DUNCAN

S. A. Hayman, Lyda Theatre, Grand Island, Nebraska, says:-

"Started 'Vengeance—and the Woman' last night, and had them packed clear out in the street. Believe me, that sure is some humdinger of a serial, and from the looks of the first chapter, it looks like it's going to be better than 'The Fighting Trail'."

THE UNANIMOUS VERDICT!

A. L. Guinness, Victoria Theatre, Toronto, Can., says:-

"Just finished running third episode of 'Vengeance,' and it should prove the best investment in pictures I have ever made. The first episode opened with a bang. My receipts shot up 100 per cent, and ever since, my Mondays and Tuesdays have doubled their previous average. No exhibitor can go wrong in booking it."

THE BOX-OFFICE TELLS THE TRIUMPHANT STORY OF

"VENGEANCE—AND THE WOMAN"

Featuring
William Duncan with Carol Holloway

W. H. Gambien, Bio Theatre, Billings Okla., says:-

"'War tax problem solved'. Thought 'The Fighting Trail' was the best drawing serial ever put out, but my patrons like 'Vengeance—and the Woman' even better. The exhibitor who fails to follow 'The Fighting Trail' with 'Vengeance—and the Woman' will, in my opinion, stand in his own light. Both serials have broken all former house records."

D. A. Kenworthy, Lyric Theatre, Fort Dodge, Iowa, says:-

"'Vengeance—and the Woman' third episode receipts better even than 'The Fighting Trail' which had previously increased our receipts over features and serials nearly 100 per cent. Patrons well pleased. Glad to recommend this serial as a money getter."

"PICK O' THE PLAYS"

A MAN'S MAN

" Our Opinion," from Screen Opinions

This is a light-hearted affair, full of action and fun, very well acted, with settings that look good, and good, clean-cut photography. The story is a breezy, entertaining tale, and there are chuckles all the way through. Kerrigan takes the part of the impulsive, reckless, happy-go-lucky Webster in good shape, although he is given a trifle to crowding up front stage whenever the opportunity presents. The cast has been well chosen. The big scenes—the scenes of the revolution and the fighting in the streets, have been handled very well. We would label this one a very worth while picture that should please almost any audience of ordinary intelligence.

MADAM WHO

" Our Opinion," from Screen Opinions

There isn't a let-up of interest throughout the entire seven reels of this civil war play. Both the action and acting are fine. The story is told clearly, although it is a tangled plot, and the suspense is worked out very well. There are many fine scenes of the civil war—and many tense moments. We'll say it's a ripping, gripping war drama. Perhaps the idea of its being a war drama will discount its value somewhat, but seeing as it is a civil war play and has nothing to do with the present strife, we hardly believe it will. Good music will help it immensely. The print reviewed was rather dark.

A PARALTA-BARRISCALE-PLAY

Writing in the Picture Play Magazine, the greatest critic in the United States, Mr. Alan Dale, says:—

"'Madam Who' is a particularly excellent picture. Miss Barriscale can give points to many a star who relies upon her 'emotional possibilities.' The 'close-ups' of Miss Barriscale's horror-stricken features are most vivid and admirable. It is the best piece of emotional work that I have seen in many a day, and some of our 'legitimate' stars might feel proud of it.

"Scenes in a night camp, and the view of a burning city and its evacuation, with rioting and pillage, lift 'Madam Who' into a prominent position. I should say that it is a distinct advance in the picture art—and I emphasize the word 'art.' Here's my hat off to Miss Barriscale."

What Becomes of the Ticket Window Money?

"I'll admit," says the picture showman in Our Town, "that many a dollar rolls into my box-office. But it keeps on rolling. I'll declare I don't get it. All I get is the exercise of selling tickets."

Mr. Showman can guess what becomes of the dollar. He figures that a big part is claimed by the high cost of production. He's right, too. The studio overhead is one of the things that has been mounting along with the cost of inhaling a livelihood. However, the motion picture manufacturer is taking notice. You won't find the average studio today staging the mad saturnalia of expense-be-damned that once it did.

There's taxes. Yes, the admission tax takes some of the dollar too. And there's decreased attendance, the reflection of other taxes.

There's distribution also. The showman dimly realizes that distribution gets part of the dollar. It hasn't been in the spotlight until now. But it has been getting more than its share of ticket money for almost the last four years.

By distribution we mean service, and selling, and exchange facilities, and all that sort of thing. Four years ago fully half the exhibitors in the country looked to General Film Company for distribution, and expected to make money, and did make money.

When the exhibitor began to accept service and selling and exchange facilities from every Tom, Dick and Harry who set up a shop the exhibitor began paying over and over for all those things which had already been provided by General Film Company, and without getting a bit more film.

No wonder it cost more!

You can't spend your dollar for all of the distribution there is in the United States and have anything left of the dollar.

General Film Company today again can give any showman ALL the product he needs at ONE cost of distribution.

Because it is a strictly service organization, through which the live, progressive manufacturers release their best.

One Whose Genius for Human Appeal Is Perpetuated on the Screen

Charm, Quality, Appeal — these three things are vibrant in the O. Henry stories. Translated to the screen, here are motion pictures of the right sort.

No author had such a mastery of the fine essence of life. The works of O. Henry as visualized perpetuate it in graphic form. The theatre with an O. Henry subject on the program prospers.

Such is the box-office verdict.

And critics add their applause in words like this:

"Delightful pictures which carry all the charm of the original."

"They carry the powerful heart appeal bound to win favor."

"An O. Henry picture can be put on any program."

"It may be that O. Henry is destined to gain his real permanency on the screen."

"It not only reveals new possibilities for the motion picture, but a new and valuable interpretation of the O. Henry plots themselves."

This Week's O. Henry subject is another two-reel classic—"COMPLIMENTS OF THE SEASON," with Betty Blythe, Herbert Prior and little Aida Horton; the story of a tramp, a child, an heiress and a dog. An exquisite thing of laughs and tears.

TRIANGLE

How Do You Value a Picture?

There are different ways. How does this way appeal to you?

The value of a moving picture to an exhibitor is entirely dependent upon the amount of money that it will bring into his box office. This is independent of whether the picture contains a star, is made by any particular producer or is founded on an unusually interesting story.

A photoplay that does not return an exhibitor a reasonable profit is a failure. Beyond question—isn't it?

Our problem is two-fold—first, to distribute pictures that will be box office attractions and second, to sell them to exhibitors at prices that will leave them a profit.

There are a few motion picture stars whose popularity is sufficient to nearly always draw a crowd. Pictures made with these stars have the first requisite of success—that of being box office attractions. If however, these pictures are sold at prices so exorbitant that exhibitors cannot realize a proper return from them, they lack the second requisite—that of profit. It therefore follows that from the exhibitor's point of view they are not successful productions.

The basis of a photoplay is an interesting story. Motion pictures can be made, based on themes of such vital interest and so well produced, that they will contain both requisites of success—box office attractions and money-makers for exhibitors.

The Triangle program offers an exhibitor pictures based on the best stories attainable and made at the largest and best equipped studios in the world.

Triangle pictures are also offered to exhibitors at reasonable prices. Any exhibitor who knows how to present moving pictures can make money with Triangle productions.

We also offer to exhibitors " star " productions —the best pictures ever made by two great film artists—William S. Hart and Douglas Fairbanks. Our policy is still consistent however, in that we offer these pictures at prices which insure a profit.

The above shows you how we value a picture. As we have stated, we believe that successful productions must be first, box office pictures and second, must be sold at profitable prices to exhibitors.

Does this method of valuing a picture sound reasonable to you?

AT THE

RIALTO

(The Temple of the Motion Picture—Broadway)

Producers of "Features" Advertise the Fact Broadcast When S. L. Rothapfel Uses ONE of Their Pictures Now and Then. Rothapfel Uses Our Pictures Regularly, But This Week There Were TWO That Were So Good That He Used Them BOTH.

He Arranged His Program Especially So That These TWO Features Would Stand Out.

This Is What the Writer of "Seeing the Rialto With Rothapfel" Said in the Motion Picture News:

Then came "The Ridge Roamers," a Robert C. Bruce-Educational film. It seems that one after another of these pictures stir the audiences as scenics have rarely stirred them and the intensely human note of the pictures and the clever titles get close to the audiences' heart. An idyl from "Siegfried" was used as the music for the superb scenic setting which got laugh after laugh and a big hand at the end.

* * * * * *

Everyone got the connection between the bull fighting in the opera and the picture, which was sub-titled, "A Celluloid Version of the Pike County Fair." Now this was another one of the Robert C. Bruce-Educational pictures. It could hardly be called a scenic, but it was close to it. How many managers would dare put on the bill two subjects from the same source and expect to get away with it. No matter how high the quality, one might think that he had run short of sources of material. But that wasn't the case. On account of the excellence of both pictures Mr. Rothapfel wanted to use them, and he found a way by introducing the beautiful musical number and so linked up the opera selection with the picture that the effect was gripping. In other words, everyone felt that just the right thing had been done.

These Pictures Are Worth Rearranging Your Program To Use. They Will Improve Any Program. They Are Real FEATURES That Will Keep Your Audiences Talking About Your Theatre.

THE BLACK BOOMERANG

An Answer to

THE BIRTH OF A NATION

By

D. W. GRIFFITH

This is a great big red-blooded story in seven reels that will smash its way to the hearts of the most blase' among humanity.

What Uncle Tom's Cabin was to literature, the Black Boomerang will be to the Motion Pictures. It is founded on the prophecy of our own President Thomas Jefferson:

"WHEN I REALIZE GOD IS JUST, I TREMBLE FOR THE FUTURE OF MY RACE."

The story is not intended as propaganda. It prea hes no solution of the negro problem, one of the most vital in America today. It will offend neither Northerner or Southerner, as the questions involved are handled with delicate and masterful skill. The narrative runs the whole gamut of the human emotions, with its raids in the heart of Africa; the slave chase in the southern seas; the auction block in Virginia, and other thrilling spectacles. Running through the whole is a powerful and soul stirring love tale that will thrill the most hardened misogynist in the audience.

The more YOU read these advertisements the more useful to YOU we can make the "NEWS."

The Story of an Institution

by C. A. Johnston

A Bit of Foreword.

When I recited to a business friend, the other evening, the story given below he expressed both interest and surprise.

"Why don't you tell these facts to your readers?" he suggested.

So we give them.

You get only a printed message from us each week. Perhaps you will like to know of the institution back of the message,— its size, novelty, resources, and individuality.

You, too, may be interested and surprised.

Have you any idea, for instance, of our annual budget?

Six Solid Tons of Paper Every Week.

EVERY week we print and issue six solid tons of Motion Picture News.

We go to press a magazine in size, a newspaper in celerity. Forms are held open later than those of any other periodical published, to catch every last announcement of a busy industry.

Then the issue is shot to press like a morning newspaper. The printing, binding and mailing are done at night. Twenty modern presses running all night, and sixty men are required to do the trick.

Magazine Service Geared Up Like A Daily.

The first mail is caught at six o'clock in the morning. Thereafter until twelve noon sacks of copies for each state are rushed to specific trains in order that every subscriber to Motion Picture News shall have his magazine at the earliest possible moment. To give a concrete idea of the careful precision of the schedule, copies for Southern and for Northern California leave on different trains and from different depots in New York City.

Many copies go out special delivery.

The foreign delivery reaches the following countries: Australia, British Guiana, China, Denmark, Dutch East Indies, England, France, Haiti, India, Ireland, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Russia, Scotland, Siam, South Africa, South America, Spain, Straits Settlements, Sweden, Switzerland, Wales, West Indies.

This magazine-newspaper contains from 138 to 284 pages every issue.

The 1917 volume of Motion Picture News comprises 8600 pages.

3600 Pages in One Year's Issues.

The pages of a single issue of Motion Picture News for 1917, if put end to end, would extend a mile in length. The pages of all the copies printed in 1917 would stretch, end to end, from New York to Bombay, India, via London.

The payroll staff of Motion Picture News comprises fifty-three people. Our salaries are high in the publishing world. We are in receipt, almost daily, of applications for editorial staff work from newspaper men all over the country.

Big Papers in Other Fields Cost But Half

In addition to our fifty-three salaried employees and our large editorial staff, regular field correspondents on space rates are maintained in every exchange centre of the United States and Canada.

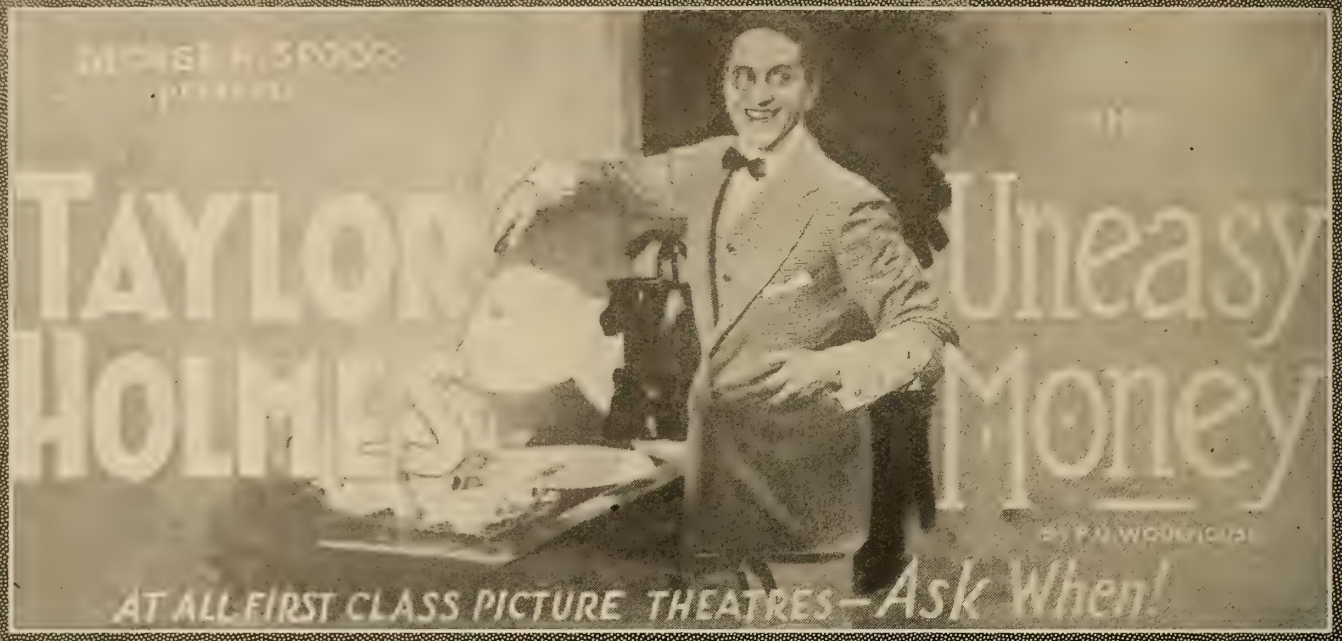
Branch offices are maintained in Los Angeles with four employees; and Chicago with three employees.

Sixteen States Get Two Papers at One Price.

Two sub-editions of Motion Picture News are already maintained—the West Coast and the Central States—for subscribers in a total of sixteen states, giving them a wealth of local news impossible in a national edition. More of these sub-editions covering other groups of states are under way. These sub-editions appear each week as inserts in the regular copies of Motion Picture News so that the subscriber gets "two in one"—a national weekly plus a local weekly newspaper. These sub-editions are maintained at considerable expense. They, too, have special field correspondents.

The offices of Motion Picture News cover over half an entire floor space in the Godfrey Building, New York City. Eight dictaphones are required to answer correspondence. Telephone calls outgoing and incoming average five thousand a month or sixty thousand a year.

The circulation department alone has nine employees headed by a man who built up and had charge of the circulation of one of the largest and best national periodicals. A complete circulation unit, employing multigraph, mimeograph, addressograph and graphotype outfits is geared up as if it were handling a million circulation. Card files scientifically keep track of everyone in the industry.



The complete annual expense of Motion Picture News is nearly a quarter of a million dollars.

Much More to Be Told —Later.

These few salient facts—many more could be cited—will give an idea of the amount of work and resources employed in the weekly production of this remarkable magazine-newspaper. We know of no other weekly publication into which as much effort and expense is put. Many a trade journal of consequence in other big industries is published with half the editorial work that goes into the "News," and half its general expense and resources.

¶ MOTION PICTURE NEWS is big because it meets the all-around service needs of a big industry, an industry of the fifth estate and ranking fifth among the nation's industries.

¶ MOTION PICTURE NEWS is a powerful and constructive factor in this big, new industry because it is solidly and fearlessly and wholly independent.

George K. Spoor says:—

The quickest way to add to your income is to go to any Kleine System exchange and engage the productions that are advertised to the public all over the United States on the twenty-four sheets (like the above.) You can not help drawing big patronage and satisfied audiences. Others are doing it. Why should you wait? BE A SHOWMAN!

Volume 17. No. 6 February 9, 1918

War and the Trade "Over There"

WE will do well in these times of war alarms and war pessimism to review the present and past experiences of the British film trade.

We are just entering upon war: Great Britain has had nearly three and a half years of the great struggle.

We have raised vast sums of money, it is true, and had a portion of our man power conscripted. We are under taxation, and facing a degree of industrial disorganization, lack of fuel and transportation embargoes.

But Great Britain has passed through a long and tremendous strain upon its man power and financial resources, the degree of which we can scarcely conceive.

Yet after three and a half years of war strain we find these significant facts about the British film trade.

More films have been produced in Great Britain during 1917 than in any previous year.

More films have been imported from America the past year than in any pre-war year.

Less than one thousand picture theatres have been closed and these mostly small theatres.

Most of the open theatres are more prosperous than ever before. Many have been helped, just as others were closed, by the transference of labor from one place to another for war work.

Exhibitor organization is in better shape than it ever has been.

In addition to the heavy burdens of the film duty and entertainment tax many and large donations have been raised by the theatres and the general trade for war and charitable purposes.

The present entertainment tax levied by the Government amounts to about $22,500,000 a year.

The admission tax is considerably higher than our 10 per cent tax.

* * * *

BRITISH theatres have survived the severest conditions of lack of labor and transportation facilities. They have also stood the strain of increased costs of films, wages, fuel, electricity and the like.

Early in 1917 the whole industry was deeply alarmed over the rumor that the Government would look upon theatres as non-essentials and close them. This, like other related rumors proved to be a false alarm. The common-sensible fact is now clear that the Government views money as a munition of war and does not class as a non-essential a tax earner of twenty-two and a half millions a year.

And finally we find in these true barometers of the trade, the trade journals, full and continuous evidence of a normally healthy industry. The British journals have even increased in size during the war.

WE fail to see from the foregoing any reason for war fog and pessimism within the American industry. We can only see, on the contrary, good practical reasons for solid faith in the future whatever conditions may confront us. We can see even a rosy outlook as soon as our national transportation problems have been solved and our industries are humming, as they must and will.

Many of our theatres report earnings in excess of those of 1916. The big houses everywhere are prosperous. The serious complaints come only from the small houses; and these, we believe, as we have stated, are suffering mostly because the industry itself has not arisen to their specific wants.

We believe this help for the small houses forthcoming; in fact we already see it coming. Some one will make the circulation of film through these houses—constituting as they do, the bulk of our theatres—a profitable enterprise to all concerned.

* * * *

SO we repeat our advice. If there is a good business justification for your house and you are doing what a showman should and can do then stick to your post. The right business reinforcements are bound to come to your aid.

Don't listen to the calamity-howlers. Shut your ears to this talk and go straight ahead.

And—also—don't lay the blame of your own inefficiency to war conditions. It's an easy mistake to make.

One of the big exhibitors was in our office last week. He is not a big theatre owner; he is at the head of an organization that now owns a large string of theatres and some of those recently acquired, are very little ones. "Cheese-boxes" he calls them.

But he is putting them all solidly on their feet, little and big ones alike. One good-sized house in a large city that six months ago took in around nine hundred dollars a week now runs as high in receipts as two thousand; a little house with a checkered career now takes in an average of four hundred dollars a week, three times what it formerly did.

And the interesting fact is that in no case did the successful manager change the picture services. He improved the houses and then gave better service—and advertised! The trouble had not been with the pictures, but with the management. Good management and a little more outlay have converted two "losers" into steady profit makers.

* * * *

"ARE you afraid of war conditions?" we asked.

"Haven't even thought about it" he replied.

This man states that there is as much waste in exhibition as in distribution or production.

Speaking Editorially:

There's One Consolation

LAST week we ventured a thought on the fact that the doctors who would prescribe for the picture industry should first find the patient.

Is it the small theatre? Is it the photoplay palace? Is it the producer or distributor?

We haven't had any luck ourselves finding the patient. One day, after listening to a score of film men, we decide that it's the exhibitor, and the rest of the business is strong, hale and hearty.

The next day, when several more film men have poured their tale into our ears, we decide that the exhibitor is crowing lustily, with the producer an anemic wreck.

Makes us think of one picture figure who was recently asked if he was making any money.

"No, I'm not," he declared. "But I defy you to tell me of any one who is getting more fun out of life."

That $100,000 Illusion

IT would be a great thing for the picture business if producers and distributors could forget that figure $100,000.

The director who starts out to make a "big special," immediately sets his eyes on that $100,000 figure, and doesn't stop spending until he has reached it—and occasionally not even then.

The distributor, starting at this mark, also starts his profit expectations at the same $100,000 figure.

If he is selling territories his profits are gaged to that $100,000 figure; if he is booking through his exchanges, his rentals must balance it off.

And so the circle continues, like the snake that thwarted Hoover by swallowing itself.

Do Figures Ever Lie?

AN exhibitor we know had figured for months that he was making a little money. The bank account saw an addition of one hundred and fifty to two hundred dollars every week.

In a few idle minutes one day he started his pencil working on such hitherto neglected things as depreciation, interest on investment, and necessary precautions against the termination of his lease and a possible rental boost.

He had his own figuring checked by the financial advice of his local banker.

Now he says he is losing fifty dollars a week!

He is cutting his cloth accordingly now, and he will probably soon find himself really making the profit he formerly thought he was.

Have you checked up your books recently?

A Place for the Magazine

"THE news pictorial has gained its place," declared a man interested in short subjects to us the other day, "but the news magazine has a hard battle to find its place."

Which proves—to us—that most exhibitors are making an error of judgment, or else we are not an average fan.

To us—and it has seemed in our experience to most audiences—the screen magazine is a distinct program asset. It is full value entertainment in itself—and psychologically an actual aid to any feature getting across.

The Government and the Express

WE have received many requests from exhibitors for information regarding the Government's probable attitude toward film shipments in the event of official control of express companies coming to pass.

Frankly, we haven't been able to find any information to give.

The Government doesn't know itself. The position of the Government in railroad matters is much similar to that experienced by the trade papers when the war tax bill was passed.

You can get as many opinions as you can get men to interview. None will agree with any other; none will give a guarantee against changing their minds within twenty-four hours.

Which resolves itself into the fact that your own opinion is as good as the next fellow's.

Not a Word—Only—

WE haven't heard a word along Broadway regarding World Film's remarkable offer of free film use detailed in last week's Motion Picture News.

No—not along Broadway.

But we feel certain we'd hear quite a few words—and words of cheer—out along the highway, out where the great eighty per cent is found.

And that's what counts, isn't it?

Our Story—Your Story

WE believe you will be interested in "The Story of an Institution" on pages 818 and 819 of this issue.

It's the story of Motion Picture News—our story, and, in a way, your story.

For Motion Picture News is yours; dedicated to your service, achieving success only in such measure as it gives service.

And it is because of the special interest they have always manifested in us that the photoplay editors of the country will within a few days receive "The Story of an Institution" in elaborate booklet form.

War and the Trade "Over There"

By waste in exhibition he means, of course, the exhibitor's inability to get into his theatre as much of his public as he should and at the prices he should get. This man's results—they have made his whole enterprise a success—are pretty sure proofs that he is right.

War will not tolerate this exhibition waste—nor any other kind of waste.

But this waste—and generally it is just the difference between a losing and paying theatre—is just plain inefficiency.

Let us not charge inefficiency to war. Let us not have inefficiency during war.

Serving It with Speed and Ginger

TAKE it from a trade paper person, the proverbial "calm before the storm" is a boiler shop compared with the calm that descends on Filmland after a storm.

Last week there was so much news that we could just barely cram it all between these two covers. This week—well, we'll guarantee you a fully interesting hour's reading matter, but as far as news alone is concerned there isn't quite the pep and snap of last week.

But, somehow, we have a hunch that it isn't the calm after the storm but only the calm between storms.

* * * *

PERHAPS our hunch is prompted by the whispered information that the limited confines of Jacksonville, Florida, will this week hold no less than the three imposing forms of S. A. Lynch, Adolph Zukor, and Lewis J. Selznick. "3—Count 'em—3. At one and the same time—seem-ultanee-ously, ladeez and gentulmen!"

Gosh, maybe we shouldn't have told!

But then, maybe our informant was all wrong, anyway. So, why worry?

* * * *

TO get back to this week's NEWS. As we promised last week we are giving you the first of our "Practical Plays for Busy Producers."

Perhaps, after you have read the tabloid drama, you will say that the author's satire is overdrawn. Mayhap it is. But so many facts come to our attention week in and week out that approximate the facts of the satire as to make us hope—earnestly—that the author will overdraw his facts so strongly as to cause a biff-bang reaction.

When we get time to look into that question of studio waste more closely we picture men will find both less time and inclination to howl about a half cent a foot film tax.

* * * *

THE fuel story, in so far as it applies to the United States, has little that is new since last week's NEWS appeared.

We told you then that reports received from many points showed that picture theatres had found the closing order a holiday boon rather than a hardship. Later word from our correspondents brings confirmation of this from every city in the "east of the Mississippi" territory affected by the Garfield order.

But from Canada comes a new scare. A move has been set on foot in the Canadian Parliament to close down picture theatres for a three day a week spell.

Just after we had buried the same bugaboo, too.

* * * *

THAT "Manufacturer to Exhibitor Direct" Plan is looming up a bit stronger. Seven independent producers are now found in the line-up that will attempt to put over the latest "cure-all."

Then Tom Hamlin, that thick-and-thin fighter from Minneapolis, had to walk into town with a contract for six hundred odd theatres tucked under his arm. Said contract now reposes in the offices of the "Direct" plan.

Guess we had better keep a weather eye out for action.

J. C. GRAHAM, who has been re-visiting New York for a few weeks, has a few observations to make in this issue concerning conditions abroad.

You'll want to read what he has to say. But if you are like us you won't get any enjoyment out of it.

Why?

Oh, simply because our feelings are jaundiced by real jealousy that the foreign market should have stolen from our midst so square and thorough a film man as "J. C."

In five years walking up and down Knocker's Row—from Forty-second to Forty-ninth Street—we have yet to meet a man who didn't start boosting the minute you menioned the name "J. C. Graham."

That may not sound like much but it's only because we writers have mis-used and wasted words so long and often in near-pressagentry that you don't get the full force of what it means not to have an enemy—or even a knocker—in the Film Mart.

And we've been "on the outside looking in" on J. C. Graham since he hung his hat in the Universal offices, through its brief repose with the ill-fated United and then to Mutual.

Now he visits us as "Famous Players' foreign representative."

We're sore.

* * * *

"WILLIAM DUNCAN SIGNS WITH PATHE." There's a heading of news interest in this week's NEWS.

Duncan's sudden flash to prominence through the medium of two overwhelming successful serials is one of the big studio events of the past year. No one will deny that the box office and exchange figures on Vitagraph's "The Fighting Trail" and "Vengeance—and the Woman" justify any amount of calcium light that can be thrown the director's way.

Which brings us to one of our pet theories. We don't suppose that our opinion matters much, but we have always held to the claim that the studios offer many an unknown director trained in the dollar-a-foot days who will be putting dividends on the record sheets while some of the far-famed "master" directors are giving their backers apoplectic fits in the effort to get away from $75,000 expense sheets.

Merely our opinion, of course. And our bank account dosen't give any promise of the theory being tested even on a split-reeler.

* * * *

THERE's more studio news to be found in the fact that George Loane Tucker is now presiding genius of the Goldwyn studios.

It's a far cry from Edison in the near-pioneer days to England and then back to Goldwyn's wonderful Fort Lee studio, but George Loane has developed apace with the best in picture art with every inch in the course—sometimes he has been a bit ahead—and, wonder of wonders, he's kept every friend and booster he had in the journey.

The Solemn Truth Satirized

By HAL REID

[Editor's Note.—Some will say that the author of these tabloid dramas has exaggerated his facts somewhat. Perhaps he has; but the basis is truth, solemn and unpleasant We are publishing this series in the hope that, even though drawing a long bow, some help may be given to the move to stop a good share of the waste in this great big industry at the source—in the studios. By way of footnote we might add that the principal facts told of in these dramas are REAL—names and details have been placed on file in this office by the author.]

Esemon.....A Picture Producer
Upstage.....A Picture Star
Twistandle.....A Camera Man
Killtime.....A Property Man

Discovered—Director, Star, and Bunch of Extras.

Star.

Say, when do we take this scene? I've been dressed and waiting since half past nine this morning and it is now a quarter to six.

Director.

(Hotly)—
Are you speaking to me?

Star.

I hope so. This is the third day I have been called for this scene, and it hasn't been taken yet, and I'm getting sick and tired of it.

Director.

[illegible]

Star.

(Hotly)—
Too bad about you. I'll tell it to Mr. Esemon, the proprietor; that's who I'll tell it to.

Director.

(Lazily)—
I should worry, go to it. What care I?

Star.

It's a shame, that's what. When I was on the stage at the Theatre, they made sets bigger than this one during a seven minute overture, and they've been two days getting this dinky Library ready and it isn't finished yet.

Director.

(With superior air)—
I suppose you know that in a theatre all the scenery and properties are ready to be set.

Star.

And could just as well be ready in a Studio by giving a week's notice to the proper departments.

Director.

Why worry? "Time was made for Slaves."

Enter (carrying Camera Magazines) the Camera Man.

Director.

Hallo! Billy, did you get "loaded up"?

Camera Man.

Yep, I was going to load yesterday afternoon and be ready for today, but we got into a game of craps and I didn't have the time, and this morning when I started to load up the Electrician wanted to play pinochle for fifty cents a game, and I couldn't get away.

Director.

Who won?

Camera Man.

I did.

Director.

Good boy—(calling) Props, props. (Temperamentally) Where in Hell is that Damned bone-headed property man? Does anyone know?

An Extra Man.

You sent him out for a paper of pins.

Director.

Oh! Yes, that's so.

An Extra Man.

I heard him say he was going over to New York for them.

Director.

I don't suppose there is a paper of pins in Fort Lee. He ought to have gone to San Francisco.

Star.

There is a paper of pins on the table there.

Director.

Well, why didn't some one say so? I have been holding the shooting of this Scene to have those hangings pinned up. (Sits in chair.) I suppose we'll have to wait until he gets back, it's his business to drape them and he will have it to do. (Suddenly yelling to Extras.) Hey you, don't leave the Studio, we're going to shoot this Scene right away.

(A laugh of derision among extras.)

A Voice.

Aw! dey bin' tellin' us dat fer two days now.

Director.

You're getting your money, you should worry.

Enter Proprietor, Esemon.

He hesitates, stands at a distance, looking at Director. Starts toward him, hesitates and stops. Makes a resolve and going near Director falls to his knees and kow-tows three times until his forehead hits the Stage, looks up appealingly—gulps, swallowing lump in his throat.

Esemon.

May I speak to you if you please?

Director.

I guess so. What is it; make haste though; I'm occupied.

Esemon.

Yes, sir; excuse me but you used eighty-seven thousand nine hundred feet of film for the first three reels of this picture, you had over seven hundred re-takes, and I think—

Director.

(Temperamentally.)

I don't care what you think, don't come here when I'm in the atmosphere of this Scene and annoy me about a few feet of stock. What do you want to do, make me spoil this Picture?

Esemon.

(Hastily.)

Oh! No, sir. I sincerely beg your pardon; don't be angry with me, Mr. Director, I am utterly dependent upon you for my pictures; kindly forgive me.

Director.

I'll think about it.

Esemon.

It was most thoughtless of me. You see the thousand dollars' worth of fresh roses you were to have taken day before yesterday have faded and—

Director.

(Yawning.)

I didn't feel in the Atmosphere day before yesterday—there are other roses.

Esemon.

Yes, sir; I know. I was only going to ask, with your permission, when I may order another thousand dollars' worth?

Director.

(Temperamentally.)

Say, you let me do my own ordering, and quit butting in on my art or I'll not be responsible for the Picture when it's finished.

Esemon.

(Quickly.)

Very well, very well, just as you say. Just one thing more and I will go—

Director.

I've given you about all the time I care to.

Esemon.

I received a Scenario the first reel written by Augustus Thomas, the second reel by David Belasco, the third reel by Rudyard Kipling, the fourth reel by Harold Bell Wright and the last reel by all of them in collaboration, the whole Scenario having been gone over by them and perfected. I think it is wonderful. I thought of asking you about buying it.

The Director: "Go way! Go way! Don't bother me when I'm in the atmosphere. What's a few hundred feet of stock, anyway?"

Director.

(Yawning.)

You may hand it to me, I'll look it over and see if I can fix it up, and if I can I may make a Picture from it.

Esemon.

Thank you, sir; excuse me again for bothering you, and I wish to thank you for not spending as much of my money as you did last week.

Director.

(Easily.)

Oh! that's all right, run along now, I want to talk to the Camera man.

Esemon.

Yes, sir; I'm going.

He Exits bowing as he backs out of the Scene.

Enter Property man.

Props.

Here's the paper of pins (handing it.) And O. K. this expense slip, will you?

Director.

(Looking at slip.)

Three dollars and twenty cents—Why the Taxi?

Props.

Aw! Didn't you tell me to hurry?

Director.

(O. K's slip.)

So I did. How long will it take you to pin up those hangings?

Props.

Can't do it just now, my assistant 'aint here.

Director.

I asked you how long it would take you?

Props.

When he gets back, about two hours and a half.

Director.

All off folks until to-night; come back at eight o'clock, I'm going to have a bite to eat.

"Props"---"Why the taxi? Say, didn't ya tell me to hurry? And wot's an expense account fer, anyhow?"

Metro Organizes New Company

Aims to Incorporate Screen Classics to Produce Features for Release Through Metro—Will Control Super-Productions

A FURTHER advance within the motion picture industry, despite the seemingly heavy burden which war has imposed, is indicated in the announcement this week by Metro Pictures Corporation that it is launching a new producing company.

According to the Metro statement, the company has organized and within the week will incorporate a new company, to be known as Screen Classics, Inc., which will acquire, produce and present big feature productions which will be distributed through the Metro Pictures Corporation.

Screen Classics, Inc., it is said, will be composed of some of the men prominently identified with the present Metro organization, together with others who have now associated themselves with them for the larger activities of the new company. The stock of Screen Classics, Inc., will not be offered to the public.

The new concern will be expected to handle all of the big special productions up to the point of distribution, and will control all of the super-pictures which Metro already has demonstrated its ability to produce.

Screen Classics, Inc., is said to be the natural outgrowth of Metro's entrance into the field of first, second and third run productions, as well as theatre runs of a longer period. Beginning with "The Slacker" and "Draft 258," Metro's line of big productions has been worthy. "Blue Jeans," with Viola Dana; "The Legion of Death," with Edith Storey; "Lest We Forget," with Rita Jolivet, and now "Revelation," with Nazimova, and the Drews in the five-act feature novelty, "Pay Day," made a special company necessary because of the new productions already in preparation. A "hand picked" organization which will devote its exclusive attention to these greater works.

President Richard A. Rowland of Metro, in speaking of the new company, said: "Metro's larger requirements made a big feature producing and handling company necessary, as Metro has only began on its great schedule, carefully outlined and prepared during the last eight months. Proceeding on the Metro policy of being sure of our ground before entering upon any enlargement of our activities, we have made haste slowly but surely. The new company will make great pictures, some with big stars, and some without. The essential dramatic necessity, the play, will in each case be the guide and aim.

"Metro is building permanently, and the new big organization will insure the continuance of big productions for Metro to market to the exhibitor. Metro would never have called on first, second and third run exhibitors to break the shackles and run their own theatres if Metro did not intend to supply the productions enabling the exhibitor to make money and maintain his business independence."

Industry Sends More to War

Director Raymaker, Dick Donaldson, Milton Sims and E. Richard Schayer Among Latest to "Hock Der Kaiser"

IN the hustle and bustle of the past few weeks, attendant upon fuelless Mondays and other things to which the industry was a stranger before the war, the lads in the picture field who are unshouldering their jobs to shoulder a rifle for Uncle Sam have been more or less overlooked.

As if in direct retaliation upon the Kaiser for bringing the conflict into the studios to the extent of shutting off the coal supply, the industry is sending men in large numbers every week to the various camps. The industry as a whole does not hear of these boys leaving for a trip "over there," but it feels that no branch of industry is doing its bit more cheerfully and wholeheartedly than the picture business. Facts substantiate this belief.

Herman Raymaker, Triangle-Keystone director, is one of the many at the Culver City Studio who is expecting to leave on a moment's notice for American Lake and the "olive drab." Raymaker has received his classification card from his exemption board and his mark is A1. Dick Donaldson, assistant to Director Jack Conway, is another who has received a similar classification.

Milton Sims of the Triangle-Keystone forces, is busy getting his affairs in order so that he will be ready to go when Uncle Sam calls the next draft army into service. A clairvoyant told Sims that he surely would be summoned for war service and the next day the comedian began preparations by offering his recently acquired automobile in a raffle.

E. Richard Schayer of the Paralta staff of authors, has applied for enlistment in the Army Aviation Corps, and has passed the physical examinations He expects to be called in a week or ten days. Mr. Schayer has tried several times before to enlist in some branch or other of the army, but was unable to do so because he had previously lost his citizenship of the United States by serving in the British army. This was at the beginning of the war, when he was sent over by a New York newspaper syndicate as war correspondent, with Richard Harding Davis.

Due to the censor rules of that time, he was unable to cross into France; and his determination to get to the actual fighting front resulted in his enlisting, which deprived him of his American citizenship, under the ruling at that time. Since America has joined in the war, however, this law has been changed, and he is enabled to join the liberty army of his own country, and is now bearing arms for the U. S.

Laemmle Proclamation Spreads Rapidly

The house order signed by President Carl Laemmle, of Universal Film Manufacturing Company, calling on all employees of the company to refrain from critizing the Administration fuel order, which Motion Picture News published last week, was later given out by the White House to the press associations and Washington correspondents of newspapers, according to a statement from the Universal offices this week.

The announcement declares that it is the first time that a house order issued by a motion pitcure company has been deemed worthy of dissemination through official channels.

Derham Makes Tour for Select

Comptroller J. A. Derham of the Select Pictures organization, left last week for an extended trip to the Southwest and West. Mr. Derham's first stop was at Dallas. Here he expected to spend a week, during which time he will supervise matters pertaining to the accounting department of the Select Exchange in that city.

Leaving Dallas, Mr. Derham will spend several days or a week each in Los Angeles, San Francisco and Seattle, and will probably stop in Denver on his way home. In each of these places he will look after the accounting departments of the Select exchanges established in these cities.

Ontario League Elects Officers

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Ontario held its annual meeting for the election of officers on January 15 last, with the following result: W. Baillie was unanimously elected president; P. J. Nolan, of Ottawa, was re-elected vice-president; F. E. Karn, re-elected treasurer, and H. Alexander, of Toronto, re-elected secretary.

The Executive Committee is composed of Toronto and out of town exhibitors, about evenly divided. A meeting of the Executive Committee was called for Sunday, January 20, at 2 p. m. to discuss several important matters which have been pending.

Whitney Takes Over General in Denver

G. W. Whitney, an experienced film salesman and executive of several years' standing, has just been appointed manager of General Film Company's branch office at Denver. He leaves the management of the Mutual Butte exchange to assume his new position at Denver, and was formerly manager of the Pathe exchange at Denver. Mr. Whitney is well acquainted with both the exchange and exhibitor departments of the film industry, having been manager of a Kewanee, Ill., theatre for a time and later proprietor of a well-known Denver theatre.

Canada May Lose Three Days a Week

Government Contemplates Closing Theatres and All Amusements as War Measure—Tuesday Closing in United States Proves Beneficial to Exhibitors and Showmen

CONTEMPLATING action somewhat similar to the recent move of the United States in ordering a complete shutdown of industry, especially the theatres and amusement places, for at least one day each week, the Dominion Government is making arrangements to close the various provinces of Canada up tight for three days each week.

The plans of the Government are being met, however, by strong resistance from exhibitors and showmen, whose chief weapon in combating the measure is that it will mean ruin for theatres, in addition to leaving the country depressed and broken in spirit.

Final results are yet in doubt, but exhibitors have high hopes of heading off what they consider disastrous legislation.

Exhibitors Band Together

As a primary step of the exhibitors in taking united action toward saving their business from the government order, which was expected to materialize on Tuesday of this week, wires were being sent to all exchanges and exhibitors as follows: "Understand that the Dominion Government contemplates closing all theatres and places of amusement for three days each week. Action is expected Tuesday of this week. Wire Sir R. L. Borden your strong protest and have your Dominion member also wire Borden. Have at least ten prominent citizens, including bank managers, mayor, labor leaders and war veterans wire sure at your expense protesting against such action. Only the immediate and combined action of all interested will prevent this ruinous, disastrous and unnecessary legislation. Theatres are all open throughout Great Britain by Government request to prevent general morbidness of the population. There is no necessity for different measures in Canada."

These wires were dispatched to the theatre and amusement men throughout the Dominion by the Committee of Motion Pictures, Vaudeville and Legitimate Theatres and Film Exchanges.

Would Disrupt Theatres

The exhibitors are making no attempts at concealing the seriousness of the situation, and say that unless every means is taken at once to influence the Government to either change its plans or modify the proposed order, the theatres of the Dominion, and all kindred industries, will sink into a sea of financial ruin. This, the exhibitors contend, will bring about a state of affairs that will place the country in a low spirit, which can do no good either at conservation or in aiding the troops already abroad. It appears already understood among exhibitors and showman that should the order be made permanent, there will be no attempt to keep the houses or other places of entertainment and amusement open for the three remaining days, as receipts would not be enough to make it worth while.

England, it is shown, has found that the theatres and amusements are absolute necessities to the public and to the general conduct of the war. As a result all theatres in England are operating as nearly normal as possible, and good conditions have been noted, following this move.

Just what the Dominion's idea is in outlining plans to enforce a three-days close-up each week has not been made entirely clear, but it is accepted generally that the thought is to conserve on a basis more strict than formerly, beginning with what are considered non-essentials.

United States Prospers

In the United States, the recent order closing theatres and non-essential industries for one day each week until the first of April is developing into what exhibitors and managers term a "cornucopia." Although showmen are agreed that had the Government stuck to its original plan to keep the houses dark on Mondays, dire results might possibly have ensued, the Tuesday closing has met with the immediate approval and hearty endorsement of every exhibitor in the country. It has been proven, in the two Mondays thus far the theatres have been open, that the holiday crowds which turn out for that day more than repay the box offices for the shows lost Tuesday. Following Sunday, a day of rest, Monday dawns, figuratively speaking, bright with promises of plenty. As thousands who are employed in factories and stores which must necessarily close on Monday under the fuel order are left with a full day and full pay on their hands, the theatre box offices are the only haven of refuge left. Motion picture shows are giving more performances on Monday, and are said to be finding these extra shows making up fully, financially, for the Tuesday's lay-off. Other theatres make up for the offday by giving a matinee Monday, which draws larger crowds and more cash than the usual Tuesday night show. As a rule, Wednesday is likewise proving a money maker for exhibitors, owing, the managers say to the fact that Tuesday under the new fuel legislation is tighter than any day in the week ever was before the war.

This state of affairs is keeping the public spirit at a high plane, and much satisfaction has been expressed both by the Government and the public at the way things are working out. Some cities have, naturally, experienced slight difficulties in the matter of pictures and amusement because local fuel administrators interpreted the closing order in various ways. Detroit, St. Louis and other cities labored under a three-days-in-succession closing, which brought immediate action on the part of exhibitors, with the result that the matter was straightened out, and the theatres are now getting their full share of patronage.

All houses are paying employees full salaries for the week, and, unless more drastic measures arise in the line of conservation, exhibitors see nothing to fear. They say conditions are rapidly righting themselves for a steady pace through the duration of the war.

Virginia Exhibitors Warned of Censor

Jake Wells, the well-known Southern exhibitor, has wired all Virginia exhibitors to be on their guard concerning a censorship bill now pending.

The telegrams stated: "You are herewith informed that a very drastic motion picture censorship bill is now up before the Virginia Legislature, and referred to committee to pass upon it. It is up to exhibitors to act quickly, as the passage of the bill will do irreparable damage. I advise you to wire objections to the member of the Legislature from your county, and also wire me if you will attend an immediate meeting at Richmond."

Mr. Wells filed his telegrams at Richmond on January 25.

"ED." IS RATHER UP AGAINST IT!

After You Read "Seeing the Rialto with Rothapfel" Take a Great Big Jump and Give a Moment's Thought to the Problems of Ed. Fellis of Hillsborough Illinois

(From the Hillsborough, Ill., News)

ED. FELLIS who insists on conducting a clean orderly theatre has found it necessary to close the gallery except for the use of private theatre parties simply because a bunch of roughnecks couldn't behave themselves when allowed in the gallery. These young men and boys insisted on bouncing nails off of the bald heads in the seats below them and even some supposedly young ladies were guilty of dropping chewing gum on the heads of those sitting in the lower part of the house.

Mr. Fellis tried to curb the nuisance but found it useless to try so he simply closed the gallery and the hoodlum element must be content to sit down stairs and behave themselves.

We understand Mr. Fellis has just succeeded in booking eight big feature films which he will soon present one a week at his theatre.

Bach Sees Assertions Work Out

Points to Decrease in Number of Exchanges in Canada, and Calls It a Help to the Situation—Business Better

"SOME time ago," said W. A. Bach this week in an interview with MOTION PICTURE NEWS, "I wrote an article on existing conditions in Canada as far as the film business was concerned, and certain gentlemen professed to disagree with me."

The article Mr. Bach referred to was published in MOTION PICTURE NEWS, and carried the writer's assertion that the only hope for Canada lay in the reduction of the number of exchanges operating there. This, he insisted, would have the effect of reducing the cut-throat competition, as he remarked, that has done neither exhibitor nor exchange any good.

"And today," continued Mr. Bach, "the reduction of exchanges has come about in a very measurable degree. Triangle, Globe Films and Griffin Pictures have all closed their exchanges, I am informed, Superfeatures, Ltd., handling Griffin pictures, and Regal Films the first two. This has helped the situation, and so has the slackening of the inrush of film, which was at its high tide in July when I wrote the article referred to above.

"Claire Hague, general manager of the Universal Film Company in Canada, who was in New York last week, tells me that business is really better now than it was months ago, although he agreed that there was still too much film in the country. So great is this congestion of film that several of the big producing companies have not even a first run in Ontario, the big-paying province of Canada, which also claims almost fifty per cent of the theatres in Canada.

"Again I am informed that three big pictures that should have made good in Canada, by virtue of their quality and record over here, were played for a week's run and taken off in three days with losses totalling over the thousands. F. R. Lennon of the Universal Company in Canada, who recently made a flying trip in Western Canada, informs me that prices have suffered greatly, and that instead of $800 and $1,000 first runs in the West, one is lucky to arrange a showing at $250.

"Many companies, notably the Universal, have cut down their releases in Canada, and yet when it is considered that there are twenty-seven exchanges operating in Ontario and nearly as many in the other Canadian film centers, I still contend that still more film must be cut off before profits will be the order of the day again.

"Canada is an open booking country just the same as the United States. It took longer to come, but it is there now, and those companies like the Regal and Allen Films (Famous Players) which own their own theatres in different centers of the country have really the best sort of proposition for the Canadian market.

"I do not say the above to create the impression that Canada is bankrupt and that the film market is gone, but simply to correct the impression that still exist over here among a lot of producers that Canada is a little gold mine and that they can get huge prices for their pictures any and all times. Canada has held up remarkably well throughout her three years of war and there is no doubt she will finish right in the ring, if she is not asked to carry too great a film burden."

Lederer States Position in Patent Case

Carl F. Lederer, producer of animated cartoons, has requested that MOTION PICTURE NEWS make the following statement of his position in recently dropping his patent suit against the Bray patents as told in these columns.

He states, "I will make it clear to the trade just why this action in the Patent Office was dropped by me. The first animated cartoon which I produced and upon which I depended in establishing my rights was photographed at the Lubin plant in Philadelphia under the direction of Lawrence McCloskey. It has been impossible for either my attorney or myself to locate this film on account of the change in the personnel of the directorship of the Lubin Company. My second reason was that after a thorough investigaation of the methods and processes employed by other manufacturers of cartoons, I found that the subject matter covered by the Bray Patent is in universal use today."

More Producers for "Direct" Plan

Brenon Productions and Shubert-Hammerstein Offerings Added to List, Offering Product Direct to Exhibitors—Hamlin Signs for Exhibitors in Many States

DEVELOPMENTS early this week indicated that the Manufacturer to Exhibitor Direct Plan, recently presented to the allied exhibitor conference at Washington, and since taken up by the producers independently, is progressing to sizable proportions.

The Brenon Productions and Shubert-Hammerstein-Ince offerings were added to the roster of producers interested in the new proposition late last week bring the list to include seven independent organizations.

Another development was the signing of contracts by Thomas Hamlin, of the Associated Theatres, Incorporated, covering a membership of 654 theatres, with prospects of the enrolling in the near future of additional states.

Hamlin Going Out for "Bear"

The headquarters of the Associated Theatres aggregation is in Minneapolis, Minn. Immediately after signing the contract for his members to work under the "Direct" plan Mr. Hamlin announced that he was starting West immediately to extend that organization in the States of Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska and Montana, and that these States would book in conjunction with the States, which he now represents, to wit: Minnesota, Wisconsin, North and South Dakota.

A representative of the "Direct" plan declared Monday: "Contracts will be closed this week for New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Kentucky, Illinois and most of the South. Exhibitors' organizations in every State are organizing to handle this service, and after the meeting Friday evening, when communications from all parts of United States were read before representatives of the seven independent producing companies, they were all very sanguine and confident that the plan had 'gone over' and would be a success."

Charles C. Pettijohn of Indianapolis, Ind., and Lewis L. Levine of Brooklyn, N. Y., prepared and reduced to writing the plan upon which the seven independent producers are proceeding, and are cooperating with the Independent Producers' Committee in the furtherance of the same.

The plan is for the producers to market films direct from producer to exhibitor. Mr. Pettijohn, after the convention, sent telegrams to the prominent exhibitors and exhibitors' organizations in every state. Seventy favorable answers were received containing suggestions and ideas which have been incorporated into the general plan of the organizations. Five independent producers serve as the mainspring of the organizations and these five will pay the expenses of two or more prominent exhibitors to attend meetings called by exhibitors for the purpose of taking up this plan and to represent both exhibitor and producer in the closing of contracts to put this plan into effect.

These manufacturers propose to produce and release fifty-two pictures a year—one each week. They are ready to enter into direct business relations with the exhibitor to the end that a large cost and profit may be eliminated. The plans specify that the pictures shall not cost less than $25,000 or more than $50,000. To the gross cost, the manufacturer shall add 25 per cent which shall be his guaranteed minimum profit. This gross cost shall be taken up by the forty-eight states in proportion to its number of theatres, cities and population. All revenue derived from such distribution in excess of minimum quota, in each state, shall be divided between the manufacturer and the exhibitor. In order to make up the gross allotment there must be 2,700 days of bookings for each picture. Each state has been given a certain number of days booking as per schedule which is furnished.

The plan is to bridge the gap between the two permanent branches of the industry. Each exhibitor is invited to send suggestions and exhibitors are asked to get together and act. Exhibitors will be consulted as to plans of production, stories and directors. The organization is known as Manufacturer to Exhibitor Direct with offices in the Longacre Building, New York.

Cropper Quits Standard Film

Phil M. Ryan Moves Up to General Managership from Sales Manager—Convention Held in Kansas City

RUMORS of impending changes in the executive personnel of the Standard Film Corporation, with headquarters in Kansas City, received confirmation this week when the resignation of R. C. Cropper, president and general manager of the organization, was announced. The Standard is probably the largest independent exchange system in the United States, operating offices in Kansas City, Chicago, Minneapolis, St. Louis and Omaha.

Phil M. Ryan, who has been sales manager of the Standard during the past year, was appointed to the general managership of the organization upon Mr. Cropper's resignation, and immediately set about planning an intensified campaign of activities in 1918. Mr. Ryan was formerly connected with the Paramount organization in the Middle West, and was district manager at the Central Western offices of Bluebird and Universal before becoming sales manager of Standard.

General Manager Ryan called a convention of the managers of Standard's branch offices last week, and it was at this meeting, in Kansas City, that F. J. Warren, treasurer of the company, made the announcement of the changes. The purpose of the convention, aside from the above, was to discuss future plans of the corporation. Besides the two-reel Billy West comedies, two-reel W. H. Productions and the single-reel Christie comedies, Standard is distributing the Wm. S. Hart, W. H. Productions release, "The Bargain," and "The Bandit and the Preacher," and "The Hell Hound of Alaska." It is understood that in the future Standard will release at least one big picture a month.

The Standard has also secured distribution rights on twenty-eight two-reel Keystone comedies, said to be copyrighted Mack Sennett pictures issued by W. H. Productions. Three Charlie Chaplin pictures are included in the latest comedy "buy," it is said. These are "Her Trysting Place," "Dough and Dynamite" and "His Pre-Historic Past."

"Our Policy," said Mr. Ryan, "is to have the productions that the exhibitor wants and needs, and to give him, at all times, genuine personal service. My job is to see that we do not deviate from our policy, a good-sized job, someone said to me, but I think that almost everyone has a good-sized job on his hands these days. Incidentally film men, and that certainly includes every exhibitor, are going to help to boost the country over the present crisis. President Wilson regards the motion picture industry as one of a very few absolutely essential. Picture men need have no fear for their welfare in the coming months, is my belief."

Mr. Ryan made no change in the management of the various Standard offices, with the exception of the Kansas City office, where the local manager will be R. C. Herman. Mr. Herman takes the place of J. L. Shipley, who resigned the managerial desk on being offered association with A. H. Blank, of Des Moines, Iowa, Mr. Shipley having associated with Mr. Blank before, and Des Moines being also Mr. Shipley's home town."

The following are the other branch managers of the Standard: St. Louis, F. J. Fegan; Chicago, F. B. Rogers; Omaha, J. W. Rachman; Minneapolis, C. W. Stombaugh.

Sid Grauman, Managing Director, and D. J. Grauman, President, of Grauman's Million Dollar Theatre in Los Angeles

San Francisco Strand Is Sold

Sid and D. J. Grauman Turn Theatre Over to M. L. Markowitz—Will Enable Them to Look After New House

SID AND D. J. GRAUMAN, who are opening the new million dollar theatre, Grauman's, in Los Angeles, have sold the Strand, one of the best houses on San Francisco's Market street, to M. L. Markowitz, the well-known manager of the California Universal Film Exchange in that city. The price is about $45,000, although stated in the newspapers to be $100,000.

The Strand has a fine location on Market street, right in the center of the city, and the theatre has been doing a particularly good business.

Mr. Grauman, the young manager, and his father, D. J. Grauman, have been in the theatrical business in San Francisco for twenty-one years. The elder Grauman established the first ten-cent vaudeville house in San Francisco, the Unique, then [illegible] Odd Fellows' Hall, at Market and Seventh streets, and later established Grauman's theatre, which became the Lyceum. Immediately after the fire of 1906 the Graumans built the National theatre, at Post and Steiner streets, which they ran with much success. Other ventures included the Grand theatre, in the Mission District, and the Auditorium, the big amusement palace that was destroyed by fire two years ago.

This will enable Messrs. Grauman to give all of their attention to the Los Angeles theatre, which opened Friday evening, January 25, with "The Silent Man," William S. Hart-Ince-Artcraft subject, as the principal part of the program.

Elaborate plans were made for the opening of the new million dollar house, which is considered by experts thoroughly familiar with all theatres of the country to be the most handsome and expensive motion picture exhibition palace in this country. The theatre has scores of very attractive features for the convenience and pleasure of its patrons.

Pennsylvania Exhibitors in Organization

At a meeting of exhibitors held recently in Pittsburgh, at which about fifty exhibitors were present and a number of out-of-town people represented, the first temporary organization for an exhibitors' circuit in Western Pennsylvania was formed.

The organization, it has been announced, will be known as the Tri-State Exhibitors' Circuit, and will work in conjunction with other circuits, taking in exhibitors of Western Pennsylvania, Eastern Ohio and West Virginia.

The organization states it is not affiliated with any organization, and that all bona-fide exhibitors are eligible to membership.

A. J. Barthell, former president of the Exhibitors' League of Western Pennsylvania, is now engaged in arranging details, and expects to present his final report at the next meeting. Headquarters are maintained at 804 Penn Ave., Pittsburgh.

General Foreign Representative Graham of Former Company Arranges for Distribution in France—Ten Offices Maintained—Star System Well Established

WITH the return of J. C. Graham, general foreign representative of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, who has been in Europe for the past eight months studying the situation in Great Britain and France, comes the announcement of a contract entered into with the Gaumont Company which is said to be the biggest moving picture deal ever consummated in France.

This contract, which becomes immediately effective, is considered important not only owing to the tremendous amount of money involved, but as an indication of the future policy of the film business in Europe, as well as demonstrating that modern film production is sweeping the world.

England Likes Star

"The star system was already well established in England," said Mr. Graham, "but in France no effort had been made to properly exploit such productions. We had a contract with a concern for the handling of our film, but Mr. Zukor sent me to Europe owing to the extreme necessity of arranging to have the output placed for France in the hands of an institution strong enough financially and with an organization well enough equipped to handle the distribution satisfactorily, in accordance with the new policy covering the changes in production.

"I found Leon Gaumont, the head of the Gaumont Company, in a receptive frame of mind for the ambitious and enlarged policies of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. As a famous producer and controlling a powerful chain of distribution as well as operating large picture houses, Mr. Gaumont has given much study to existing conditions, and though he has not been in America for more than a year he has kept in close touch and has adjusted his organization for the inevitable new policies.

"Under the old regime the Gaumont Company had a contract for Pallas and Morosco pictures, and their experience with these films, through their distributing offices and in their own theatres, satisfactorily demonstrated the future trend of the business in France. On account of war conditions they have decided to change their own producing plans, and confine their production activities to a few larger subjects each year.

Public Critical

"As in this country and in England, the public had become critical, and the Gaumont Company wished to secure a contract that was in line with their high standing in France, and recognized the fact that Paramount and Artcraft pictures are splendidly suited for the long runs that have become the vogue. They were far-sighted enough to perceive the trend the star situation had taken in England and America, and felt confident that the French public would follow. They have arranged for a big campaign of publicity from the standpoint of great productions and stars, so that when the war is over they will have forged so far ahead of their competitors that they will never have any serious competition.

J. C. Graham, Foreign Representative of Famous Players-Lasky

"This move of Gaumont is extremely significant, in that this contract is entered into at a time when France has entered into the fourth year of the war and the eastern front of that country is the main theatre of the conflict, and conditions would not seem propitious for the undertaking of such a gigantic amusement enterprise if the Gaumont Company were not overwhelmingly convinced of the wisdom of the project. It should also dispel any pessimism that may exist in this country, for it reflects the confidence in France of ultimate victory over Germany.

Gauge of Morale

"I believe that the theatre is a good gauge of the morale of the public, as was evidenced by the great revival in theatre conditions since the announcement that America had come into the war, which has been quite marked, beginning last September. The amusement situation was at a low ebb, and even now cafes and similar places are shut down at 9:30 every evening, though the theatres are permitted to finish their performances. It has been shown that the motion picture is the favorite amusement of France, for despite the dark days that gallant country has seen, and the curtailment of non-essential things due to economic conditions, the public has held determinedly to its picture houses.

"The contract with the Gaumont Company covers France and her colonies, Switzerland, Belgium and Egypt, which will be served by the ten distributing offices maintained. The distribution in Belgium, of course, will begin after the war. The Gaumont Company has the largest theatre in Europe, the "Gaumont Palace," located in Paris, with a seating capacity of 5,000. The prices of admission run up to ten francs ($2.00), and it is a magnificent playhouse, well conducted, and enjoying the patronage of the best people. Paramount and Artcraft films will receive elaborate presentation in this theatre, similar to that of our big picture palaces in New York City.

Only the Best Takes

"The indifferent film is doomed in France, as it is in this country, and I believe the industry will emerge from the conditions the war has brought on in splendid shape, crystallized and strengthened by reforms which have become necessary.

"I must confess I have been surprised at the pessimistic talk I have heard from some quarters, which is in contrast to the spirit exhibited in France where the fighting is taking place, and the nation is repelling attacks by air and undersea. We all have to make sacrifices, and experience some inconveniences, but the American exhibitor with the instincts of a real showman who will adjust himself to the inevitable need have no serious fears. In times like these the biggest and best productions with the famous plays and noted stars will weather the storm. In the battle for supremacy the man who brings the biggest guns to bear will win, and longer runs with the best pictures is the slogan to be adopted."

Exhibitors Not Required to Stamp Tickets

E. S. Bowman, secretary of the Automatic Ticket Selling and Cash Register Company, has returned from Washington, where he secured a decision from the Government of interest to all exhibitors regarding the Government requirements.

Mr. Bowman has received written communication from B. C. Keith, Deputy Commissioner, Treasury Department, Washington, to the effect that moving picture exhibitors will not be required to have printed on tickets the legend, "War Tax Paid," for the reason that this applied only to those advance sale tickets, purchased prior to November 1, upon which the war tax had not been paid.

"Compliment to World Skill"

Publicity Department Is Authorized to Make Announcement Concerning "Noble Pursuit of Bushwhacking" in the Industry

"PARTLY playful and also partly in earnest" is the rather elastic sentence used by the publicity department of World-Pictures Brady-Made in announcing this week what the company considers a compliment to its skill in picking stars.

"A favorite indoor sport among manufacturers during the past year or more," declares the publicity department, "has taken the form of paying World stars two or three times their World salaries to sign contracts elsewhere. This is a process quite complimentary to World skill in picking stars and developing them to a high point of artistic perfection, and it also places the motion picture business in a class by itself, not alone in the noble pursuit of bushwhacking, but in singular lack of foresight.

"To illustrate, Ethel Clayton's contract with World-Pictures Brady-Made will expire during the month of March, and after a vacation she will go to work for another company at a salary reported to be $2,000 a week for forty-four weeks. Naturally, it is no part of the present utterance to state the amount paid to Miss Clayton under her World agreement further than to say it was such that the corporation could afford to sell her pictures on its regular program at regular prices.

"The experience of other manufacturers who have paid fancy sums for former World stars has been that it was necessary to greatly increase the amount previously charged to the exhibitor, in the first place inviting his resentment and in the second invoking a condition made to order for this situation.

"For example, Alice Brady retired several months ago from World-Pictures Brady-Made, yet the corporation still has several unpublished Alice Brady pictures, which are being issued from time to time on the World program at World prices. One of these, called 'The Spurs of Sybil,' is due for publication at the beginning of March, with others to follow in due course.

"A long time ago, when Clara Kimball Young left the World Film Corporation to join a new management at a greatly increased income, several of her pictures, made and held in reserve for this situation, were released covering a period of some months' duration, and a similar case was developed in the instance of Robert Warwick.

"Of Miss Clayton's finished photoplays there will be a considerable number by the time her contract is ended, and presumably they will be published covering quite a long time and entering into active competition, at program prices, with the new pictures of this artist produced at the higher cost reflected in her inflated salary."

Crest Reports Numerous Sales

Announces "Grain of Dust" Is Arousing Unusual Interest Even Before Picture Has Been Shown to the Exhibitors

CREST PICTURES CORPORATION this week announced that its David Graham Phillips story, "The Grain of Dust," is arousing unusual interest—enough to lead the controllers to believe that the production will surpass even the fondest hopes which they have held for it. Greater accent is given the statement of the feature's early popularity by the fact that it has not yet been shown to the exhibitors, the picture having been exhibited only for the trade press reviewers. MOTION PICTURE NEWS carries the review in this issue.

In the instance of a star, "The Grain of Dust" is particularly fortunate, Lillian Walker being the feminine center of attraction of the story. There is little doubt, according to Crest Pictures, that this fact has had much to do with the stimulation of sales which have been reported. Miss Walker's motion picture record is known, Crest believes, by nearly every person in this country, and that her career has been one crowned with success is readily admitted by those familiar with the industry or the theatre.

The production was directed by Harry Revier, and was cut and edited under the personal supervision of Carle E. Carlton, president of Crest Pictures. The latter, for this picture, is said to have drawn carefully upon his world of experience, and, knowing what the public wants to see in times like the present, has made a supreme effort to gratify the desire.

One of the most important points referred to in announcing "The Grain of Dust" is the cast, which Crest claims is exceptionally well chosen and competent. Ramsey Wallace has the leading male role opposite Miss Walker, and is said to make the part stand out prominently. Edith Day also is cast in one of the principal roles, that of a fiancee. Others supporting Miss Walker are Corinne Uzzell, Ralph Delmore and Richard Wangerman.

An unusual feature promised by Crest are several close-ups of Miss Walker, said to be larger and more pronounced than the usual scenes of this kind in pictures. It is confidently expected by the distributing company that these will create more interest among theatre patrons than has anything in the close-up line for some time.

To aid in "putting the picture over," Crest Pictures has arranged a strong line of advertising helps that it considers very important to the showing of the feature. These include a six-page herald, three styles of one-sheets, two of three-sheets and a six and twenty-four sheet, all made from original sketches. In addition a 10-page press bulletin has been prepared, as well as cuts and slides.

What Kind of a Fellow Is—Winik?

Being a Glance at the Real Human Side of the Big Men of the Picture Game Caught in Action

By William A. Johnston

WE had lunch with Mr. Winik some time ago.

The lunch was arranged by a third party and there appeared to be some vagueness as to who extended the invitation. But anyway Mr. Winik paid the bill. We editors are pretty good at this sort of thing, even if we cannot turn big deals on foreign rights between the oysters and entree.

There was also some vagueness about the object of the lunch. But we finally sniffed a reason. Mr. Winik wanted to find out what kind of fellows we were. He seems to have anticipated this series of interviews.

At this lunch we got a further inkling of Mr. Winik's business methods.

First he creates an uproar. He did this with us by making some statements which we considered outrageously unreasonable, and which we promptly and feelingly combated. While he battled with us he even had some side skirmishes with a few leaders in the industry whom he intentionally decoyed to our table. These men also yelled back at Mr. Winik, and one gentleman looked as though he would like to hit Mr. Winik on the nose.

We noticed that Mr. Winik ate right along during the conflict and even seemed to find it quite as enjoyable as his broiled chicken.

After the smoke had cleared away he told us pretty definitely just what kind of fellows these men were. He also said what he thought of us; (and it pleased us that his remarks were at least partly complimentary even after he had paid the check.)

These tactics, it struck us, were pretty good ones, especially as they also kept the other fellows from guessing just what kind of a fellow Winik is.

These same tactics have made some people think that Mr. Winik is crazy.

We have only to say then that craziness is a good business asset. Mr. Winik reminds us of a man who, when he sees something in the street that he wants, starts a street fight over it and then takes it away unobtrusively while the other fellows are fighting.

He did a "crazy" thing recently in Great Britain. Having control for that market of a two-a-week program of big stars and guessing correctly in advance that the stars would leave the program he cut releases to one a week and is now issuing new star pictures. Which seems to give pleasure to Mr. Winik's exhibitor patrons over there.

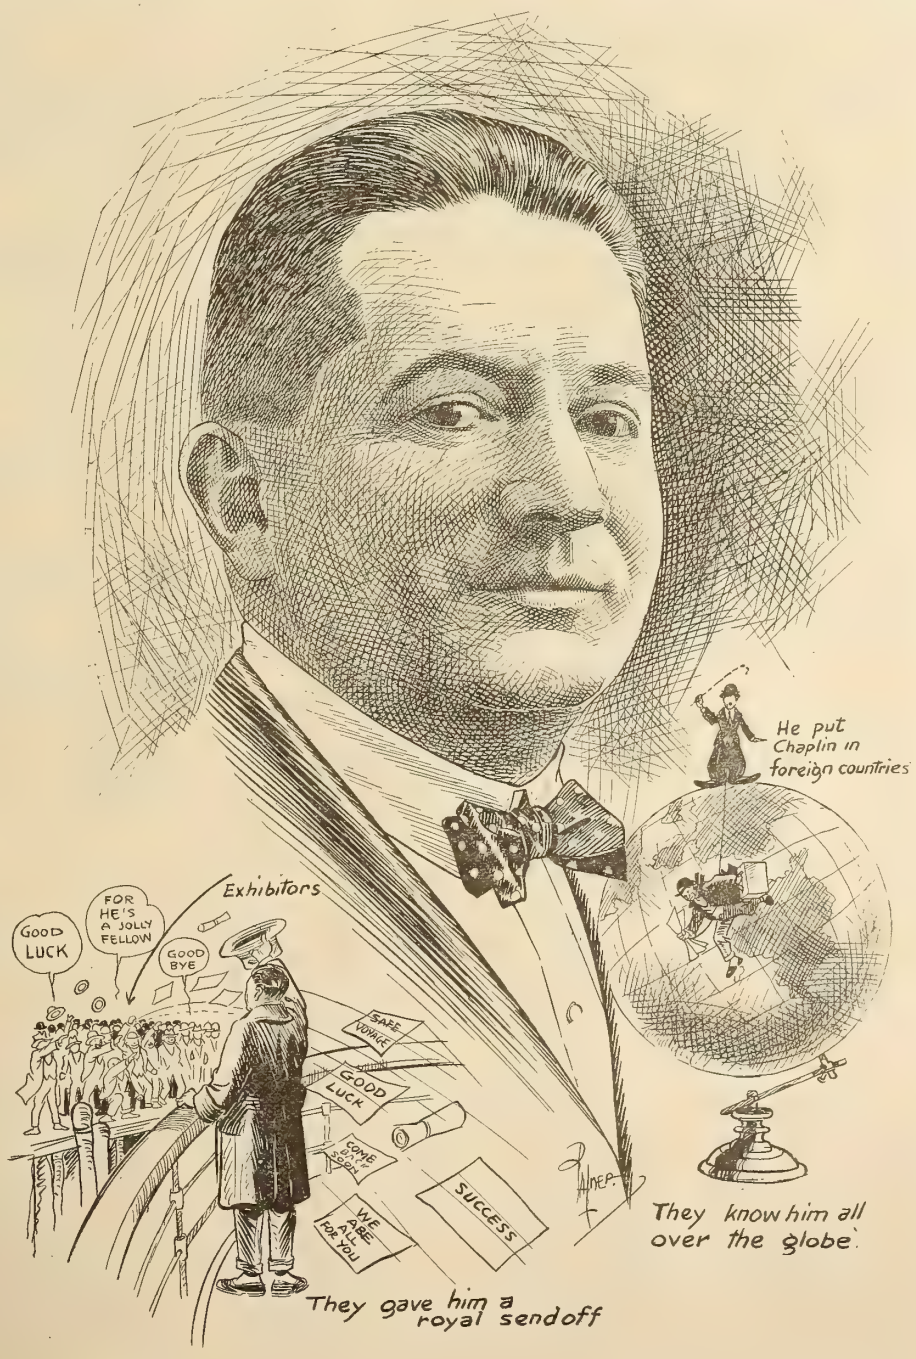
A more recent "crazy" deal on Mr. Winik's part is the acquisition of the British rights on the new Chaplin pictures.

One of Mr. Winik's "craziest" principles is to make happy those concerned with him in his business deals.

He has a small 2 x 4 office in the Brokaw building, but his desk contains daily cables from all over the world. He tackles a job at a time, works fast and completes it before he lets go. After the day's work, he forgets everything and goes over to the Hotel Astor where he lives.

Here he becomes a philosopher. If you will sit up with him and listen he will talk all night. He philosophizes on subjects as widely disassociated as the Bible and the film business. He even thinks he can write and expects to some day. But then, of course, every man has his weakness.

He would rather philosophize than play poker.



One evening when he was telling us what kind of a fellow Moses was—and his remarks were more original than complimentary— another film magnate came in and insisted upon a game of poker.

"Now look here," said Mr. Winik, "you hope to make some money, don't you. All right! How much? About five hundred? All right, I'll match you for it!" (name of loser—it doesn't begin with W—given on request).

That same evening a vice-president of a prominent Fifth Avenue bank who joined us during the conversation, passed a remark that Mr. Winik could have his (the vice-president's) shirt any time he wanted it. Having known a number of bank officials and having had the belief that they and their shirts were inseparable, the remark was a distinct shock to us. We noted that Mr. Winik didn't offer to match for the shirt.

Exhibitors Help Fund Drive

Adolph Zukor Confers with Federal Officials on Plans for Industry Co-operation—Slides Shown in All Theatres

FOLLOWING the return last week from Washington of Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players-Lasky, it was announced that plans have been perfected calling for continued co-operation of exhibitors and the entire industry in the new drive for war funds. Mr. Zukor is chairman of the Committee of the N. A. M. P. I. formed to co-operate with the Government in its war program, and his Washington trip was for the purpose of conferring with federal officials in regard to the new plans.

W. G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter to exhibitors throughout the country, expressed high appreciation of the assistance the motion picture industry has given his department heretofore. The united front that it has presented when calls for voluntary service went forth has been a source of great inspiration to all who are directly charged with the conduct of the war, according to the Secretary. In his new appeal to the industry, Mr. McAdoo asks the aid of the exhibitor in making the War Savings campaign a success.

"Secretary McAdoo has already started a campaign among exhibitors," said Mr. Zukro, upon his return from Washington, "in connection with the new War Savings Stamps drive. Three slides, prepared by the Committee of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry to cooperate with the Treasury Department, have been accepted and are being distributed among exhibitors in all parts of the country.

"Not only is it a patriotic duty of every exhibitor to use these slides as frequently as possible, but the fact that he shows them will tend to further enhance his standing among his patrons, who will appreciate his efforts toward the realization of the goal for which we are fighting."

The activities of the committee from the National Association, now working hand in hand with the Government, has received many laudatory comments in Washington. In the last Liberty Loan drive, 70,000 slides were prepared and sent out under the supervision of this committee, as well as 500,000 feet of film of patriotic appeal. The effectiveness of this co-operation in the motion picture theatre was soon apparent, as expressed by Secretary McAdoo and other Government officials. The National Association Committee to the Government consists of Adolph Zukor, chairman; W. W. Irwin, J. E. Brulatour, Marcus Loew and George K. Spoor.

Legitimate Houses Catering to Pictures

Booking records recently submitted to Frank Hall, president and general manager of the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation, would indicate that many of the largest theatres heretofore devoted to road shows, exclusively, have abandoned this policy in favor of moving pictures.

"A majority of them," said Mr. Hall, "made it a point to book special productions in preference to program pictures, inasmuch as they wish to conform as much as possible with their established policy of presenting an attraction which in itself is an evening's entertainment. Many of the legitimate theatres in towns through Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, not to mention many below the Mason-Dixon line, have found conditions arising from the war so oppressive that they have taken up pictures exclusively."

King Bee Gets Cooperation of Exhibitors and Newspaper in Distributing Musie

KING BEE FILMS reports that it is having great success with the distribution of the waltzes written by Billy West and that it is proving one of the greatest of publicity stunts. The plan is being worked systematically, so that all of the exhibitors showing the Billy West comedies will get the most possible advantage out of them.

In a letter to exhibitors attention is called to the fact that these waltzes cannot be purchased in any store, but that they will be furnished by the King Bee Co., so that they can be given away to patrons. It is suggested that the distribution of these should be undertaken on the evening that the Billy West comedies are shown.

In addition King Bee is furnished matrices of the music to any newspapers that will agree to print them, and already the demand has been heavy for these. It is suggested to the manager that he should have his musicians play these waltzes on the nights that the pictures are shown and at the same time that he make the announcements through the use of slides.

Awards for writing the best words to accompany the music are also suggested. These could be either worked by the theatre itself or through the local newspaper. Of course, in arranging any sort of a contest that requires the use of the mails you want to be sure to get the approval of your local postal officials so that you will not violate the very strict rulings that are now in force.

King Bee is also sending the exhibitors suggestions for copy which can be painted on three or eight sheets, or used for slides or newspaper advertising. Co-operation of the exchange men is also asked in another series of letters so that there will be no chance of the exhibitor not knowing the opportunity that he has for widespread publicity at small cost. One thing that especially commends this plan is that the music goes into the homes and has a permanent advertising value—something that is not true in the case of the ordinary herald or throw-away.

Camera Man.

Bully for you; double pay after six o'clock; that's the proper way to do it.

Director.

(Grins.)

It isn't my money, Billy.

Star.

(To Director.)

Say, I want you to distinctly understand that I won't stand for this kind of monkey business and I mean it—I won't stand for it.

Director.

(Pointing to it.)

Right over there is a nice velvet couch, if you won't stand for it—go over there and sit down.

A Voice from the Extras.

How about our supper?

Director.

Go to the restaurant, order what you like, I'll O. K. the checks. Come on Billy, I'm dead tired. We'll have a bottle of wine or two, the firm buys after six.

Exit Director followed by Camera man.

Star.

Sits on sofa, sighs, shakes head wearily.

Extras exit.

Property man makes out an expense slip. "Pins for picture, $1.50."

[Our thanks—or apologies—are due to the companies whose "stills" have provided illustrations for this feature. The Pathe-Rolin comedies were drafted for the one on the opposite page; Twede-Dan, of Jester Comedies, is to the left, and above is a moment in Vitagraph's "A Mother's Son."]

Strand Salaries Not Cut in Closing

Manager Harold Edel, of the Strand theatre in New York, announced this week that despite the fact a pro-rata plan for the reduction of employees' salaries for the Tuesday each week the theatre is to be closed has been submitted to and accepted by all employees of the house, the Board of Directors has voted to pay all weekly salaries in full.

What Kind of a Fellow Is—Winik?

conversation is a camouflage in more ways than one. As a matter of fact, he listens closely and takes advice freely.

In buying pictures, however, he consults himself alone, and is strangely silent. He buys suddenly out of the clear sky and pays big amounts for big pictures.

Mr. Winik's qualifications lead us to the firm belief that he is going to be some figure in the film business here. Our belief is supported by his conduct of the affairs of W. H. Productions, in which he has done the "crazy" thing of treating his buyers of territory with the utmost consideration and all around service.

We, for one, are going to watch Winik.

Why the Program—And How

Discussion of Some Essentials and Reasons for Their Employment in Your House Organ

THEATRE programs are more for holding business and getting your regular patrons to come oftener to your theatre than for creating new business. This should always be borne in mind in preparing these programs, for too many exhibitors base their plans on the bally-hoo style, evidently expecting that these programs in themselves will bring new people to their houses. The program has a most important field, but it is an entirely distinct one from newspaper displays.

Naturally there are all styles of these programs from thirty-six page illustrated affairs, often printed in colors, to the single sheet, and we will discuss the various classes here, with the endeavor to point out the good features and the useless ones. Starting this week we are illustrating some of the simpler forms which are comparatively inexpensive and all of which can be mailed in an ordinary sized envelope.

There can be no hard and fast rules made for the design of the programs, for local conditions have a whole lot to do with it, as does the class of patronage of the house, the number of changes each week and a dozen other elements that have to be considered before the manager will get just exactly what he wants. But there are a number of general policies that can be followed with success and which can be understood from a study of the ones illustrated on the opposite page.

With the exception of the folder of the Liberty theatre, Spokane, Washington, which gives only a single bill and which is more in the nature of an inducement for people to attend the theatre during the days that it covers than a program in itself, the others illustrated cover at least the attractions for a week. We do not recommend to any but the largest theatres which can stand heavy expenses the issuance of a program for less than a week for mailing purposes, and certainly none for a longer period except for the "lap-over" which we will explain later. We are, of course, taking into consideration that the theatre is maintaining a mailing list and that it is sending out these weekly programs to its regular patrons. That, and a special effort to develop the automobile trade of your section by this means, is something that we strongly recommend in connection with the house organ.

Now, the ideal arrangement of the program end of the business would be to issue a weekly program which is to be mailed and in addition print a small one-sheet program on each attraction. These could be presented with the program for the week on the earlier days of the week, and there might be a possible saving on the latter two days, although we do not believe that this sort of [illegible]

Let us get back to the proposition of the mailing list for a moment. The only objection that can be found to this is that it is somewhat expensive. One theatre manager asks how he can avoid duplication. He complains that he mails his program each week to a thousand persons and that if that thousand do come to the theatre he has to give each one of these another program. The answer to that question is that if the thousand copies that he has mailed have brought the people to his house they have been worth many times over to him the amount of expense that they caused.

Especially in the case of theatres catering to the family trade, neighborhood houses and houses in the smaller communities, especially where the newspaper facilities are poor, we believe very strongly in the mailing list idea and urge its use for the program. We believe that this is worth a great deal more than a constant succession of heralds, etc.—a game that has been very badly overworked. In this connection one exhibitor has called our attention to the manner in which the letter and postcard idea has been overworked. He calls attention that one service recommends the sending out of three sets of postcards and a letter on each production and that under the present rates of postage this would cost him eight cents, while the paper and printing would cost at least two cents more, and that even if every person addressed came he would get just enough on a ten cent admission basis to pay the cost of this stunt. Of course, no exhibitor changing daily or three times a week should attempt to do this regularly, and we don't believe that an exhibitor who changes every week should get committed to this policy, for aside from the expense this system is going to prove a nuisance to your patrons and they are very likely to demonstrate that to you by staying away from your house. Once in a while it is a good plan, but as a policy—NEVER.

We cite this because the program has just the opposite appeal. If you start mailing these weekly programs you will find that your regular patrons will feel miffed if they do not get one each week.

You can afford a mailing list and it will build up business for you if you prepare the attractive sort of a program—one that the people will preserve for the week and use for reference. We cited recently under one of the articles on "Is This Your Theatre?" the instance of a man who ran a high class neighborhood house which had proved a failure until he took charge and who hit upon the idea of getting the numbers of all the autos that visited his house, learning the names of the owners and then mailing them his programs regularly, after he had paved the way with an introductory letter. It built business for him tremendously. It will do the same for you. It will build business for the theatre in the small town exhibitor through his own section if he will watch the people who come now and then and mail his programs to them. In these days when nearly every farmer owns a car and distance amounts to little the exhibitor will do well to develop this trade, and we emphatically say he can do it.

To all these people on your mailing list, and for that matter to those coming to your theatre to whom you hand copies, you need to make this attractive so that they will preserve it. Though you have to expect a certain amount of waste, the program thrown on the floor doesn't get you much additional business.

Now, in all of these programs illustrated this week there is an absence of advertising. That is preferable where you can afford to pay the full expense yourself. In a later article we will discuss the sale of space in your program in more detail.

The next thing to remember—and this is very important—is that your program is not a dodger, that you don't have to use heavy black type and a lot of gim-crack work. What you want to do is to use a lightface, plain, readable type. We have selected these specimens with the purpose of illustrating that point.

Now, let us take up a study of these four programs.

That of the City theatre, Newark, N. J., is printed on buff stock of fairly light weight. The paper itself is 6 inches in depth by 10¾ width. It folds twice and thus fits into an ordinary envelope.

Two things especially commend this program. In the first place the cast of a number of the pictures is used, a valuable thing especially where the program is distributed in the theatre itself. The general plan in the construction of a picture is for the entire cast to be given at the beginning of the film or the names to be stated as the various characters enter. But in either case the names are likely to be forgotten, or the patron may not at that moment be interested in the personality of an actor, but before the picture is over he may want to know his name because he has been impressed with his work. There are often some of the

DOUG FAIRBANKS IN "REACHING FOR THE MOON" AND A MACK SENNETT ROARING COMEDY WILL HEAD PROGRAM COMMENCING SUNDAY, JAN. 20
AN ALL-STAR CAST

REACHING FOR THE MOON—Doug as used to be Mr. Fairbanks loves producers. Agreed, it is one of the most original pictures ever produced by "Artcraft." The story is chock full of comedy and melodramatic moments.

"THE KITCHEN LADY"—is a typical Mack Sennett—and does ensure a thousand laughs a minute. Mack Sennett's the comedy king beyond question and of the best.

Seeing the Rialto with Rothapfel

PROBABLY the most striking single number that has ever been tried in any motion picture house marks the power of the combination of the picture and the human voice, of lighting effects and music at the Rialto this week. The climax comes with the recital of "Verdun" by Miss Mary Lawton, the noted dramatic reader. But first let us see the part that the screen had, for it was the picture that led up to this, the picture that stamped the recital in its full meaning on the minds of everyone, that sealed the impression as a lasting one.

This recital comes immediately after the ending of the Animated Magazine, in fact literally joined to it, as you will see. The Animated opens with pictures of American troops at some of their training stunts in France, opening to "Hands Across the Sea" and changing to "Over There" as the wonderful silhouette views of the soldiers starting for the battle line are shown. Then follow pictures of aeroplanes for our fliers and Patrick O'Brien, the American airman who escaped from the Germans and then a Hy Mayer cartoon showing an eagle battered by the sky traffic —airships. All these scenes were given with "Aviation Tournament." There was a human touch with pictures of pelicans observing meatless day at the New Orleans zoo, for which "Indianola" was the music, and then pictures of the Bemis, N. H., railroad wreck and the washout on a Washington railroad, with "Symphonette."

Power of the screen was shown in a remarkable way in the next number which pictures the war council at Washington and then showed but three figures, first Senator Chamberlain who got a big hand, Senator Stone for whom the theatre was filled with hisses, and then Roosevelt—and then the audience went wild. The music for this was distinctly appropriate—"There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight."

Note, after the war element had been allowed to drop out for a little while, how it was brought back with a smash, and to accomplish a purpose. French reinforcements in Italy got a big hand to the music of "Le Pedre de Victoire" and then the French aviators being decorated increased the enthusiasm with "Marseillaise" being played as the French troops were reviewed. All of this led quite smoothly into pictures of Verdun as it looks today after the years of German fire. The audience sat in rapt attention, expecting something to happen, but not exactly what did. Toward the end of this picture, with the scenes still being shown on the screen, there appeared in first hardly discernable letters and then growing bolder the immortal war cry of the French, "They Shall Not Pass." Of course this brought a torrent of applause, but wait.

The animated was over, the black curtain had fallen and the words were still before the audience. Then the curtains over the display panels at either side of the screen parted and the center curtain disclosed Miss Lawton. One of the panels showed the Germans in the distance firing on the city, the other the scenes from the explosions in Verdun. The lighting effects, Miss Lawton's costume, all was in the red and then came her recital with the strains of the "Marseillaise," the music of the battle, the roll of drums and the crash of cannons, while the firing effects with the lights added to the realism. We have never seen a more gripping thing staged and the audience burst into applause. But the real moment had not come for on the panel at the left appeared the figure of Joan of Arc on horseback, while Miss Lawton added her appeal for France. And when it was over there was a wild audience in the Rialto.

In the overture this week, selections from "Tannhauser," Mr. Rothapfel has achieved the most striking yet of his combinations of the orchestra and chorus. First the orchestra renders a number of the selections and then the chorus, behind the curtains is heard in one of the selections, and then the orchestra takes up the music alone, and finally the curtains on the stage part and reveal the female chorus and those in the display panels the male members. Now here is a little point for exhibitors who are trying to do things with music and singing in their theatres. As a matter of fact it applies to everything you do. You know how it breaks into the spirit of a performance to have to watch a string of performers march off the stage. Rothapfel avoids this. He can do it with the central stage by letting the curtains fall from either side, but not with the display panels, so the male singers stand there until after the lights are dimmed and the next picture is started and then file off unseen. The spirit of the creation lives with you, but you are not brought back with a jump to the mechanics of it.

"Mt. Hood," a Universal scenic, was used largely because it gave an opportunity for the orchestra to play the second number of the "Peer Gynt" suite, a wonderful composition, and a second short scenic was "Garden Spot of the World," pictures of Sweden played with the "Swedish Processional."

Brilliant lighting effects were achieved during the rendition of "The Armorer's Song" from "Robin Hood" by Emanuel, List, basso profundo. Here the center of the huge dome was in light green, with the center in red, then a row of blue and red again with the stage bathed in red, with the flashing light effect as from the armorer's fire. The other musical number of "Polonaise," played by the orchestra.

Dorothy Dalton in "Flare-Up Sal" is the feature and there is a splendid comedy in "His Hidden Purpose," a Mack Sennett creation that again introduced the wonderful cat that created such a riot of laughter at the Rialto at its first appearance.

This bill at the Rialto this week is probably much more than other exhibitors can do, but it is interesting to all because it does show that the picture is the basis of entertainment and it shows how the picture builds up the dramatic strength of every presentation. It shows, too, that the way to make the whole town come to your theatre and keep coming, is to try to do something new every week, but never to abandon the picture as the basis of it. That is one of the secrets of Rothapfel's wonderful success. He doesn't "put on" a musical number. He links it up with the picture and as striking as the number is you remember the picture too.

And that's the reason why one always expects to see a good show at the Rialto.

Any picture can be strengthened and improved by the surroundings that you give it. Try it once.

This Week at the Strand

HAROLD EDEL achieves a splendid effect this week with the overture, "Roumanian Poem," which is put on with lighting and scenic effects that have seldom been equaled. The tumultuous applause was sure appreciation of the big audience. It is a descriptive melody opening with church bells ringing announcing the approach of the national fete, then shepherds playing, night, and the moon comes up, then the clouds gather and a terrible storm comes. The effects of the lighting and the rain were perfect, so realistic that the audience here burst into applause. Then came morning and the festival, finally ending with the Roumanian national air.

Strand Topical opens with a Paramount-Bray "Young America in Winter" and then shows a Pathe picture of ice-bound Pittsburg and then another Bray, Mrs. Bell and her cats. The pictures of Chamberlain, Stone and Roosevelt, the same as were shown at the Rialto, got the same sort of a reception, cheers for all but Stone and hisses for him. Building wooden ships and Los Angeles oil men rushing the supply followed. French reinforcements for Italy got a big hand as did the G. A. R. at Camp Kearney. The Topical ends with the same pictures of our boys in France as are described in the Rialto article.

Mabel Normand showed her popularity for there were hundreds waiting for admission when we left the theatre at 9.30 p. m. "Dodging a Million" is full of comedy and there is more comedy of the patriotic sort in "Putting Fritz on the Water Wagon." "Bruges, Belgium" is the scenic. Rosa Lind and Anita Tagel are heard in a duet from "Lakme" and Herbert Waterous in "I Want What I Want" and "Hearts Bowed Down," both of which delighted.

Metro has offered an artistic folder which its exchanges are sending to exhibitors and which could be adapted to use of the exhibitors themselves. The front page, as reproduced here, would make an attractive card for lobby display, for it is twenty inches in length and printed in five colors.

The beautiful portrait of the star, Viola Dana, could also be used for attractive cut-outs for display all around the lobby, with the smaller figures of the girl in the blue jeans.

Opposite side of the folder gives scenes from the production and provides address space.

This is the sort of exploitation matter that attracts real attention.

Some Suggestions On House Programs Taken From the Work of Exhibitors

lesser characters that attract attention, and these cause "word of mouth" advertising that is invaluable. Any motion picture page editor who has ever conducted a "Questions and Answers" department will testify to the interest in who played this or that part in a particular film. We would strongly advise printing the full cast of every feature picture. It takes up a little room and it may not bring any immediate business, but it is one of the best helps we know of in building up the good will of a house—in giving it tone.

The second strong point is the "lap over" idea to which we have referred. While the City theatre program covers two weeks, it also covers the Saturday following the two weeks, so that those who get the program on Friday, February 1, will have the announcement of the Saturday show, and we presume that the new programs will be distributed on that Saturday.

The chief thing that we do not like is the fact that the program does cover two weeks. We would strongly recommend only one week, with the "lap-over" announcement. Two weeks is a little too long to expect people to preserve the program, and it has another fault that we have stressed in the case of newspaper advertising, that is, it invites the patron to postpone his attendance to another week when he sees the announcement of some picture that he likes better. Of course, even a weekly program has some of this fault, and this should not be aggravated by the extension of the time. There is a slight saving in expense, but we believe that the City would find the increase from a weekly sheet fully justified.

Next let's take the Theatre Louisiana, Baton Rouge, La. This town has a U. S. census population of 16,000, and in addition is the seat of the state university and the state capital. And, in passing, let us say that it has an enterprising manager in P. E. Coe, who was the one that invented the phrase you will see on his program, "Did it ever occur to you that when you leave this theatre you can take only one thing away with you—an opinion? It's our business to see that it's a good one." We say that because the slogan has been adopted by several other theatres and at least one manufacturer's organ.

Louisiana used a light green, fairly heavy stock 5½ by 7 and used the full two inside pages for the announcement of the week. This gives the names of the productions and a few lines of descriptive matter about each of the features. The two cover pages are devoted to house announcements. This is an excellent program for a manager who wants to publish at the least expense and at the same time wants to keep his sheet free from advertising.

Elmwood theatre, Buffalo, uses a good grade of heavy white paper, the stock measuring 4⅜ by 9¾ inches and folding three times, giving a page approximately 2½ inches wide. This is a trifle too small, and we would prefer using a little larger stock, about the size of the City theatre.

Elmwood uses its name plate on the cover, as every theatre should do, and has a most attractive type arrangement. We especially like the effect of boxing the dates and hours of the showing of each picture at the top of the pages. The names of the stars and the title are attractively displayed and there is just a few lines of reading matter about each of the attractions—just enough to whet the anticipation.

While the policy is followed in many theatre programs and while some of the producers insist it is good advertising, we believe that it is bad policy to tell the story of the picture in advance. It's like the reader who turns to the end of the book to get the "way it turns out" before starting the first chapter. It is all right to tell the opening events of a picture and then leave the possible patron in the air, but even if there were no other error in the policy, the fact that no brief recital of the story can give the charm of the picture itself makes the plan a bad one.

While we are not going to try to point out the ideal programs until we have illustrated a number of other specimens and have come to the end of this series of articles, let us show you how one splendid program for a certain class of houses could be arranged by following the ideas given by the City theatre and the Elmwood.

We would adopt the size of the City, and the number of pages would depend on the number of times a week that changes in the bill are made. Using the same type that is employed by the Elmwood, there would be room for the addition of the cast of the feature picture, and we would insist on having this. Incidentally, we may mention that you may have some trouble getting this in advance from the exchanges, and here comes in the value of the file system that we have referred to where you have all the advance stories put away for just such uses. You should insist on these casts being supplied to you, but if your efforts with the producers and the exchange men fail you can always get the principal characters by referring to the smaller type under the heading "The Story and the Players" which is a part of each review appearing in the MOTION PICTURE NEWS.

On these inside pages we would also follow the box heading plan of the Elmwood.

The first page should be kept free of anything but the name plate, the days the

Your Idea---and Ours

WE wonder how many theatres of the country took advantage of the actual knowledge that they had to straighten out the confusion in the public mind as to what "dark" days the fuel order really meant. The Circle theatre, Indianapolis, didn't take any chances. In the Sunday papers it used this display three columns wide and seven inches deep to put the exact status up to the public. Below this was carried the regular Sunday announcement of the current attraction.

Every time people hesitate about coming to your theatre you use a considerable percentage of the possible business. Your theatre is a public institution and it's a mighty good thing to get to the whole public as often as you can with your announcements. Of course, the average exhibitor would argue that the greater share of his patrons would find out from the news columns of the paper and from other sources that his house was to be open every day but Tuesday. Yet the efficient manager never takes things for granted. He impresses while the impressing is good, and the impress is lasting.

Don't worry if you "skid" once in a while. It at least shows that you are MOVING.

INVITING [illegible]

Here is the prize example. We have warned many times against dividing your display between two different attractions, for the reason that you ought to sell today's show first. Suppose you are changing your bill twice a week. Certainly you cannot on Thursday sell the production that is already gone, but you should have been devoting the other days to bringing patrons to the picture that was on the screen then.

But here is a case, so far as typographical display is concerned, whereby the theatre actually invites the patron to wait until Friday. The display appears in the Sunday Atlanta (Ga.) papers and plays down the attractions for the first three days, then devotes as much space to the Thursday show as to the other three together, and, still further, uses even bigger type for the Friday bill. The Alpha must be counting on its "regular" patrons, for it is not going to get many new ones by following this plan.

What you want to carry in your belfry is a clear ap-peal to the best.

HERE is a rather unique piece of advertising, when one considers that it was paid for entirely by the theatre. It is an announcement of a Goldwyn month at the Empire theatre, Yakima, Washington. It cites five pictures that were to be seen in January and uses just enough of descriptive matter about each one to excite the interest. It appeared on the Sunday before

New Year's and therefore got over with an unusual punch.

There are two criticisms to be made of the display. In the first place, if the manager wanted to display the Goldwyn month feature he should certainly have used the brand name in much larger type than he did. The effect attained is that of the eye striking the titles first and then wandering back to the top of the display to find out what it is all about. Never make your reader search for the main idea; make it hit him in the face. Another improvement could have been made by using open-face DeVinne, or at least a light-face type for the announcements at either side. The contrast would have brought out all parts of the display with added emphasis. A mass of type NEVER counts.

GEORGE (Hundred per cent) FULLERTON will just keep on breaking into these columns. He is setting a strong pace for the motion picture advertisers of the country to follow.

Here is a case that very strongly shows his originality. The picture that was featured was that of the Pendleton "round-up," a special three-reel feature that had particular local interest. Naturally, the thing that attracts attention in an event of this sort is the daring riding, and so Fullerton used pictures of the horses and their riders which had appeared in two issues of the MOTION PICTURE NEWS.

He simply cut these out, pasted them on the cardboard and then blacked them over to give the silhouette effect. We have told you many times that it will pay you to save the advertising pages of this paper and that you will be able to incorporate them into your own displays without the expense of the artist's work. Try it once.

Fare well and farewell are entirely different words.

ARTHUR P. KELLY, who has written advertising for three of the Rochester newspapers, shows that he thinks by the samples of the advertising that he sends in. He uses the displays of the producers as printed in the NEWS, in cases where they fit his needs and changes them around to meet any peculiar local situation.

In this display on the Douglas Fairbanks picture he again shows that he thinks about the pictures he is advertising, for he has coined an excellent descriptive phrase: "The man who has made the smile famous." Watch that line take like wild-fire through the country. We'll wager that exhibitors everywhere will be using it.

The press work of this advertisement is very bad, for the press man evidently wanted to save ink and therefore the contrasts of the black and white effects did not come out as strong as they should have done, but that was no fault of the man who designed the ad. It is well-balanced, without exaggeration and sufficient prominence is given the other feature. The only thing that we don't like is the announcement of the bill for the following week. It takes some attention away from the current sale.

What Live Wires Are Doing

You need all your space for your current ad.—always.

Don't merely turn over a new leaf—start a new volume.

WHAT do you think about the proprietor of a motion picture theatre in a town of 13,000 who gives but one show a day and uses pages in the daily newspaper to advertise it? Don't answer this question until you have read what John C. Green, manager of the Temple, Galt, Ontario, says about himself, and others:

"I use advertising 52 weeks in the year and six days a week, not a splurge once in awhile, but all the time. Let 'em know what you have for sale has been my policy. If they know they may buy once in awhile; if they don't they will never buy. The trouble with the picture game is that it has too few showmen and too many garbage collectors."

Now, take a look at this page display. It shows why the Temple is packing 'em in. Of course, he could have gotten about all of this matter in a quarter of the space, but, as he says, he pursued the policy of making the public come to his theatre. That is the only sane method to follow in advertising. We might carry Mr. Green's analogy further and say that any clerk can sell a man something that he wants, but it takes a good clerk to sell him something that he didn't think he had to have.

Merely Mary Anning is out of style. Don't be merely a motion picture show. Be the show worth while.

UNUSUAL co-operation on the part of a magazine is presented in the case of "The Whispering Chorus," a special Artcraft release which is being made by Cecil B. DeMille. The scenario is taken from a story that is appearing in the

All-Story Magazine and the picture itself will be released at the same time as the serial is completed.

The All-Story devotes its whole front cover to the announcement of the serial and couples with that the statement that it will soon be seen in pictures. It ought to make a good exploitation stunt.

And when one remembers such a short time ago when there was no co-operation between general publications and pictures, one is struck with the progress that is being made.

STANDARD theatre, Cleveland, O., believes in putting the unusual into advertising, and the display that does the unusual is generally a good display. We have already printed a number of specimens of the work of that theatre, which have almost uniformly showed the use of one photograph and the title of the picture.

Here is the display that was used on the Jewel production: "The Price of a Good Time." There were many good catch phrases that might have been employed.

There isn't the slightest doubt in the world that this is a striking display. Placed by itself in a newspaper that gave no reading notices we would say that it was bad advertising because it failed to give more than an impression of what the picture was about.

Don't expect your patrons to build up your theatre for you. They're too busy raising the price of admission and price of other things.

RULES—or lines as we know them in common parlance—are very dangerous things for advertisers to fool with unless they know exactly what they are about. These rules are supposed to cut one subject off from another or to make one specific point stand out.

Here is a display of the Merrill theatre, Milwaukee. The man who wrote the advertisement tried to put about three times as much in it as the space justified. He had two unusually good Metro productions, one of them playing a return engagement, and yet he gave the latter half of the week show almost as much space as he gave the new picture.

What is the first thing that strikes you?—that nothing stands out except the name of the theatre and that you have to analyze the display to find out what it is all about.

Rothapfel's Answers to Exhibitors

Mr. Rothapfel Will Answer Here any Questions Regarding Problems in Exhibition. The Only Conditions Are That the Questions Must Not Bear on the Merits of Particular Pictures or Services and That They Must Come Through the NEWS. Address Your Inquiries "ROTHAPFEL ADVICE, EXHIBITORS' SERVICE BUREAU, MOTION PICTURE NEWS."

XXV—I have been very much interested in your answers in the "Motion Picture News," and I have some trouble also that I would like to put up to you. Am home after four years of study at the School of Museum of Fine Arts, from which I graduated. Of course, I am very much interested in my father's motion picture house, one of the two in this city, besides the one for colored people. We have a population of about 15,000, 40 per cent negroes, to which we cannot cater, as you understand the race conditions. I was instrumental in having father put on pictures which I had seen at the Rialto and now keep in touch with pictures you play, and often in advertising I state the fact that you have shown them. . . . Our house is simple and to me cozy, while our competitor's is more elaborate in architecture. It has about 10 per cent better location and is the pioneer house of the city. While it has a $4,000 automatic organ, we have a pianist who can play pictures and is a splendid improviser. He is assisted by a first-class trap drummer. Our musicians play all evening and the pianist in the afternoon, except fifteen minutes after the first show, when they rest. Would you advise me to go to the extra expense of $5 a week for a poor pianist to fill in this fifteen minutes.
ARKANSAS.

THE fault probably lies in the program. There must be something wrong with it. You must add snap to your performance. Give still better music. Use your decorative ability; make your house still more home-like and comfortable. Make it look like a parlor rather than a theatre. Get people talking about your show. Improve your presentation, as a whole, and add a touch of novelty to it. Apparently you are a girl with ability. Work hard. Don't be discouraged Omit long waits in your shows. Don't make your performances too long. Don't show gruesome pictures. Make your show snappy, but in good taste. Keep at it.

XXVI—I am finding the class of pictures that I am showing do not please my audiences. My theatre is the only one in a copper mining town of some 8,000 people. There is but the one industry, all the others being dependent on this. I find that a great share of the pictures are built on society themes, etc., and furnish situations which the people do not really understand. The Western pictures go big with me, but, of course, I cannot show only Westerns. While I understand that you will not discuss film services, I would like for you to suggest some way that I can build up the program. I do not believe that it is essential for me to have a feature every day in the week. I have been considering running comedy bills two days in the week, even if I have to make the bill up out of one and two-reel pictures. There isn't any doubt that my people do like comedies, but I would like some suggestions for putting on such a show so that my patrons won't think that I am trying to save money by cutting out the five-reel picture—which I am not trying to do.—A. N.

YOUR questions are very intelligently put. I started out in a mining town and found conditions similar to those you describe. Eventually I got out of the Western pictures, though when well done these are quite as good as any other kind of picture. My audience got to rely on me and I led them up gradually on to the classic pictures, which were in time very greatly appreciated.

Being the only house in your town, you have a wide latitude in the choice of your subjects. But be careful and see all pictures before you run them. You must book pictures suitable to your audience. All comedy bills are excellent, but you must be careful in your selection. The big idea is to put the situation up to the people. Make them feel an interest in your house. Tell them to let you know what they want. Make them feel that they are in the management of the theatre. Then you will find little difficulty in pleasing them with your program.

Try good scenics of countries from which the people who comprise your audience have emigrated. It will increase the favor in which your show is received if you picture the spot where they were born or spent their childhood days. Try foreign pictures. They will like the exaggerated pantomine which is distasteful to us. Your audience is of the kind that has to be carefully watched. I would indeed like to help you further and if you have any other difficulties write me again and I will be glad to do what I can for you.

XXVII—In one of the principal cities of the country I am operating a neighborhood house. It has a seating capacity of 700 and does a splendid business for one show each evening and fair business on the second show in the evening. Neither I nor any of the other neighborhood managers have been able to successfully put on an afternoon attraction. The neighborhood is too far distant from the center of the city for any considerable portion of the men folk of the neighborhood to come home for lunch or during the day, and for some reason or other the women seem to wait until evening to persuade the men to accompany them. Yet, in a sense that is not true, for the greater part of my patrons in the evening are women who come with female members of their family or women friends. Now, I pay just as much film rental for the two evening shows as I would have to pay for the entire day and my other expenses are just as heavy (with the exception of current) as they would be if I ran through the afternoon. It is out of the question for me to put on a special bill for the children in the afternoon, as others have tried to their regret. All of the neighborhood houses change their bill nightly, and you have to give the people the same pictures that have been shown at the bigger downtown houses. Is there any unique method of presentation that I could use during the afternoon without greatly increasing my expense.—NEIGHBORHOOD HOUSE.

YOURS is a case that is hard to solve. It is evidently a hard matter to get afternoon crowds. Why not have knitting clubs hold meetings in your theatre, you giving them the use of it free of charge?

Show one or two of your pictures to entertain them. SHOW THE PICTURES YOU INTEND TO SHOW IN THE EVENING. Act as host to the organization. Hire local singing talent. Call it Ladies' afternoon, or send out invitations reading "——— theatre, at home to the So-and-So Ladies' Club."

Then gradually begin to announce that you will give entertainments after the knitting club or social circle has adjourned, and ask for their help and support. I think this will work. Let me know in any event.

XXVIII—I have a house with a seating capacity of 250 in a town in which there is located a girls' college and another for men. The girls' school is particularly strict and will not allow the pupils to attend motion picture shows under present conditions, believing, presumably, that they will flirt with the college boys. Would you suggest that I devote one afternoon or evening a week to ladies only and that I prepare a special program for this occasion? If so, what would you suggest as the nature of the entertainment in addition to the feature picture.—COLLEGIAN.

THESE are questions you would have to decide for yourself. It appears to me you could eliminate the prejudice against having boys and girls at the same performance by having a matron, or a well-known lady act as chaperon at the performance. It is not to your credit that your performances are not in good standing with the faculty of the girls' school. I would strongly suggest that you make all efforts, in addition to the one mentioned above to conciliate the faculty. You must acquire their confidence in you. Much depends on the nature of your shows. The kind of attraction you use particularly begs in this instance for very good judgment. The opposition you have to meet clearly defines the entertainment you are expected to give.

ABOUT ADVERTISING

Such Questions Will Be Answered by an Advertising Expert

WHILE Mr. Rothapfel makes only two conditions as to the question that may be asked here—that they must not refer to the merits of specific pictures or film services and that all questions must come through the NEWS—exhibitors are asked not to include technical questions about preparation of advertising, make-up of house organs, and the like.

All such questions will be answered either in these pages or by mail, if preferred, and criticism given of any displays, programs, etc., by an advertising expert who has had years of experience in the motion picture field. The MOTION PICTURE NEWS is fully equipped to serve you and serve you well. We do not offer fulsome praise or glittering generalities; we seek to get to the base of your problems and SOLVE THEM.

Making My Theatre My Town's

This is the fourth of our series of articles, "The Diary of a Successful Exhibitor," by an exhibitor who will tell week after week what he has done to develop his house, the lessons that he has learned and the errors that he has discovered. It is a frank discussion of the pleasures and evils of exhibition in a town of 15,000, and the tips contained here will probably be of value to managers in all sections.

By a Successful Exhibitor

THREE weeks after I had opened I had convinced the owner of the local newspaper that I was going to make good. I was advertising liberally, and I was paying my bills every week. That was something distinctly novel to him. He had always had trouble in collecting money from the other houses, and I have learned since that this situation exists in all sections of the country and that many newspapers have found the smaller houses the poorest sort of pay. Certainly a newspaper has to be operated as much on a cash basis as anything else and the exhibitor who fails to realize this certainly cannot expect to get much co-operation.

I convinced the newspaper man that I was going to be on the level with him as well as the public. Let me say here that the exhibitor who does not cultivate his local newspapers is overlooking a mighty big bet. I could never have won the success that I gained had I not had the fullest sort of help.

All of the employees of my theatre I had selected with a purpose. The young lady I employed as ticket seller was well educated and quite a close student of the motion picture magazines and thoroughly up on the "news" of the industry. Whenever my copy of the MOTION PICTURE NEWS was missing from my desk I knew where to find it. And so when I had proved to the newspaper that I was going to make good I had no trouble persuading the editor to give me three columns of space in the Saturday issue for general motion picture news. Miss A—— was delighted when I suggested that she prepare this matter.

Now this wasn't straight advertising stuff, but little stories, and paragraphs about pictures that would come to my theatre—without any mention of my house—stories about the stars whom I had booked and various interesting matter which would be read. A great portion of this matter was rewritten from the NEWS where I found it much easier to use than to go through the press sheets of a lot of producing companies. The illustrations I obtained in most cases came from the exchanges.

Now there is one serious fault with these cuts as they are supplied by most of the companies. Whoever designs them must intend them specifically for advertising purposes, for the brand name is lettered all over it with the effect that when one of these appears in the news columns it is apparent that it is advertising. I found out one thing after I had been well launched into the exhibition business, and that is that the general public knows a great deal more than it is given credit for and that you cannot put over the obvious advertising in the form of news and get away with it.

One of the first things I became impressed with was the fact that the other exhibitors seemed to run their shows in absolutely haphazard fashion. They simply waited until their film came, sent it to the projection room and then waited for the receipts to come in. I soon learned that one of the necessities was that an exhibitor should be perfectly familiar with his pictures before he tried to tell the public about them. So I invested in a number of filing cases and in these I filed all the advanced information, press matter, etc., that came to me, together with card references to matter that appeared in the trade papers. In addition to this I used a desk calendar and made notes on this five days before the showing of each picture to look up the data that I had and then lay out my campaign. The same system was followed with my photographs and cuts. It takes a little trouble to put things away at the right place, but it may bring big returns in the end. The result was that, with the exception of a few pictures where the producers ignored the publicity end, I had fairly complete information on each production that I was to show.

In writing her material for the newspaper Miss A—— constantly used this file system and kept one of her own so that she would be sure to mention something about attractions that would be seen in the next couple of weeks. By carefully reading this press matter and picking out the little things one can really find interesting news items that go toward making up a chatty department.

There was another thing that I did in the way of exploitation that I found most profitable and which can be used in any of the smaller communities. There were three chief gathering places in the city, one at the largest drug store and soda fountain, another at the chief cigar store and pool room and the third at the railway station. I believed that a concentration of display at these three points could do more good than a lot of billposting and so I bought neat frames with glass doors for each of these places just large enough to hold a one-sheet and contracted for three additional one sheets on each production. I did not rent these, but bought them outright, thus getting clean display material. You see I wanted to make sure that no one would have any excuse for not knowing what picture was being shown at my house.

Before I had even entered the business I realized that I had to make my theatre really a part of the city life before I could score a success and especially in the advertising I used every effort to do this. I wanted to make the people turn to my newspaper advertising and my poster displays not merely to see what was the attraction at my theatre, but to see what was the real amusement in the town that day. My experience in the big city through my association with men who understood advertising made me understand that all the advertising in the world simply saying that your house is the best, and a constant use of superlatives, is unconvincing. You have first to establish the quality of your entertainment and then call attention to the various changes, merely as a statement of what you have to sell and not as a "lure-on."

Now just another mention of the filing system that I inaugurated. As soon as I got my theatre established as an institution in my town, I began to get telephone messages asking what picture I would show on dates sometimes weeks ahead. These came mainly from women who were to have visitors on those days and who wanted to entertain them. It was certainly a good sign when they turned to my theatre as THE place to take them. Before my house had opened one practically had to walk down to the doors of the other houses before they could learn what was being shown and then half of the time the display was so confusing that a diagram was almost necessary.

And there is another thing about this

HE USED HIS HEAD

This Exhibitor Wanted To Be Different from Others

SUCCESSFUL Exhibitor in writing this week tells how he was advised by a couple of exchange men to conduct his business along the lines followed by others. He replied that he wanted to be different if all the exhibitors were like the ones that he has observed in his home town.

"Being different" means that the man is thinking, and that he is putting into effect new policies, thinking up novel stunts, and using effective advertising to get results. There are lots of other successful exhibitors in the country who are doing the same thing. We want to hear from these, we want accounts of things that you have done, and, where possible, pictures that will tell the story fully.

Give other exhibitors the benefits of your experiences. They will all work to the end of greater prosperity and greater success for everybody.

For the first time a newspaper used a motion picture window display. How the Arizona Gazette, Phoenix, co-operated with Goldwyn and the Empress theatre

Newspaper Displays Pictures of Goldwyn Stars in Its Pressroom

HERE is one of the cleverest and most distinctive pieces of exploitation on behalf of motion pictures that we have seen in a long time. It was evolved and put into operation by John W. Rankin, of the traveling publicity staff of Goldwyn, through the co-operation of the Arizona Gazette, Phœnix, and Manager John Barncord, of the Express theatre.

Consent of the newspaper, which is patronized liberally by the theatre, was obtained for the use of the big window in the press room, right on the street, and heads of Mary Garden, Madge Kennedy, Mae Marsh, Mabel Normand, Jane Cowl and Maxine Elliott were cut from the lithograph twenty-four sheets and mounted on heavy cardboard and then were lined up in an orderly row in the window. Above the heads was the name Goldwyn, and in the window there was also an attractive card (not shown in the photo) announcing that all of these stars were to be seen at the Empress.

Three Settings Used in Striking Musical Numbers at Rivoli in Single Week

IT is going pretty far in a motion picture theatre when three elaborate settings are prepared for a single week's attraction. This is about the average for the legitimate attraction which is expected to have a New York run of week after week and then take to the road, but at the Rivoli last week there were three prepared for the single bill. In other words, Mr. Rothapfel has really just begun to show what he can do with the Rivoli.

Yet with all of this musical arrangements, lighting and effects of various sorts he is standing true to his promise that the keystone of his programs will always be the screen. Careful examination of this elaborate bill will show how true that is.

With Erno Rapee conducting, the overture is Friedemann's "Slavonic Rhapsody." During this rendition all the lighting of the theatre gave the gold effect.

For the first time since the theatre has been opened the lights in "The Conservatory of Jewels" were working with the showing of "Across British India," a Pathe picture in colors, which was used largely to afford an introduction to the next number. All the lights in the theatre except the jewels on either side of the screen were dimmed, producing a novel effect.

First of the three splendid settings was used in "Kashimiri Song," which followed. All the lights in the theatre glowed into red, the setting showing an Indian temple. As an introduction to the song a girl walks across the stage singing and then Joseph Martel renders the main theme, an East Indian love song.

Cold weather is really the feature of the Animated which opens with Hearst-Pathe pictures of Niagara in the below zero weather. There were some remarkable close-up views of the falls, taken from the ice, and during these pictures of grandeur the inspiring "American Festival" march was played. Mutual pictures of Chicago traffic halted by the snow, followed with "Woodland Whispers." Now in case this is used by others it should be noted that this was played with ponticello effect, reproducing the sounds of a windstorm and giving an entirely different result than the ordinary rendition. To the same music there followed a clever Mayer cartoon, "The National Patient"—the snow covered stove. Universal pictures of ice boating at Red Bank, shown to a gallop, followed. Hearst-Pathe then showed motor-ice boating at Brattleboro, Vt.

A human turn was given the animated by the introduction of clever pictures of "Peculiar Pals," showing a dog, a monkey and a cat in their frolics. It brought a succession of roars of laughter from the big audience and made one of the impressions of the whole bill. This product of Educational Films, was shown with the chorus of "He's My Pal" and then a babillage. A very opposite effect was given in the next number with Universal pictures of dancers of Java, played with original music giving the native music effect. Now note that all of these selections had been interesting without any particular appeal to strong emotions and so that left the big punch to the last.

First, and rather preparatory, were the Universal views of the "French avenging the English children," in bringing down a Zeppelin. These pictures, with "March Lorraine" played by the full orchestra got a big hand. Pictures of the war council in Paris had been shown in the weeklies at the Rialto and the Strand, but different pictures, these from Universal, were used at the Rivoli. It goes to show how pictures of the same event, although probably seen at one of the two other houses by many of the audience, got a wonderful reception under different treatment. First the Jap commissioners were shown, and these with the Japanese national anthem, ending with a whang of the cymbals and then "Rule Britannia" with the British delegates, and "Stars and Stripes Forever" with Pershing and Col. House.

In brief, here is an ideal Animated Weekly for those who want to get away from the war spirit once in a while.

Second of the settings and a remarkable treatment of a song came with the next number. First in red was revealed a beautiful scene showing an old time southern home, with the whole scene in red. Then appears Miss Gladys Rice, and she steps across the stage she calls "Joe," and from the side of the stage comes a male voice singing "Old Black Joe." As the voice dies away Miss Rice begins to sing "My Old Kentucky Home," and she puts so much pathos in the song that there is not a dry eye in the house. And, incidentally, there is a little story about this that isn't a press agent yarn, for this girl is so moved by the whole effect herself that tears stream down her face as she sings. At first the whole of the scene is in red effects, but toward the end this dies away and blue prevails, giving the added touch of sadness to the song.

Third of the big scenic effects came after the feature with the Rivoli chorus and orchestra rendering Verdi's "Anvil Chorus" from "Il Trovatore." The scene showed a band of gypsies encamped at the foot of a mountain as the day is dawning. The stage is almost dark and the anvil effect was well carried out with electrical arrangements giving the spark effect as the hammers struck the anvils.

William S. Hart in "Wolves of the Rail" is the feature and the bill is rounded out with a Drew-Metro comedy, "Under the Influence."

Typical Display at Paramount Theatre

dissemination of information. The fronts of all of the other houses were masses of posters and certainly there was anything but dignity about the houses. In my theatre I reduced these to the minimum. It was and always will be my theory that you ought to sell the people your show before they arrive at the theatre and not have to wait on lobby displays or anything else to attract their attention. I don't mean that the lobby displays do not serve their purpose, for they do, and a little later I am going to record what I did along those lines, but the chief point is that the people ought to know what you are going to show and be convinced that they want to see the picture before they even leave their homes.

But don't think that I had an easy time even after I had done this. There are various conditions that will cause bad business for weeks at a time unless there are steps taken to cure those conditions. And there is always danger of falling into the rut and once the manager is in the rut he is going to find business slipping away from him. Of course, I had the advantage of having a new theatre and to a great extent it was good for me that I was new at the business for I had to keep my ear to the ground and keep thinking all the time. While I didn't realize that I was always trying to do something "different" that was the real result.

During that length of time I got letters from two of the exchanges with which I was dealing advising me to do things like others. The writers insisted that I should follow the example of other managers, and honestly I believe that they thought that I was losing business because I did not use generally accepted policies.

And so they probably thought that I had a great deal of ego in my system that what I wanted to do was the opposite of other exhibitors—that is, if all the others were in the same class with the competitors in my town.

Pathe Plays Advertised in Leading Papers

Pathe Exchange, Inc., announces a special advertising campaign in leading papers of a number of cities in connection with the Pathe plays to be released beginning with Fannie Ward in "Innocent," which has its first regular showings on January 27. The campaign will continue through Frank Keenan in "Loaded Dice" (Feb. 10); Bryant Washburn in "Kidder & Ko" (Feb. 24) and Bessie Love in "Spring of the Year" on March 10. Eighteen papers are included in the list now prepared.

The copy will fill a half page on each picture and will be used in connection with the theatre having the first-run showing in each city. They are unusual in design with silver print illustrations giving a striking effect. For instance, the copy on "Innocent" includes a large picture of Fannie Ward and two scenes from the productions with the reading matter artistically typed and plenty of white space given.

Some Suggestions on House Programs

program covers, the location of the house, telephone number, name of manager if you desire, and the slogan of the house. We think that it is a splendid idea to devote one page to a form of request to have the program mailed to you regularly and another page to "Coming Attractions" or some one big future attraction that you want to bring out. By all means include in your program the "lap-over" page. It's a very important feature.

You have now a very simple weekly program, without advertising, neatly prepared, carrying the essential facts, and one that will be possible without great expense. You have a program that arouses interest of the Monday patron by giving him a few lines about the Thursday picture and at the same time you have served the Monday patron by giving him the program he is seeing in full, together with the cast for his convenience.

Of course there are a lot of other things that are to be considered in other classes of programs. There are cuts, the sort of gossip about the players that builds business, talks to your patrons, advertising that will help to pay expenses, and many other things that we are going to discuss in the articles that follow.

Exhibitors who are issuing programs are invited to send them in for comment in this series of articles or for criticism by letter. Others who plan to publish programs for the first time are invited to read these articles carefully and ask any additional questions that confront them.

One of Hilton's Girl Ushers

Lewiston Theatre Shows Real Class Can Be Had in Small City

LOTS of managers come to the conclusion that because they have a theatre in a small city that there can be nothing big done with their theatres. A. H. Hilton, proprietor of the Paramount Theatre, Lewiston, Idaho, whose population was given in the last census as 6,043, doesn't subscribe to such beliefs.

The photograph produced on this page shows that he believes in keeping the front of his house attractive. In the first place he doesn't clutter the lobby up with a lot of material, though he does use lobby displays, resorting mainly to cut-outs of big figures on his feature attractions. In addition he uses two sets of pictures of the production and the star and then adds some evergreen plants to give the theatre a home-like atmosphere.

Manager Hilton also pays attention to the comfort of his patrons and uses girl ushers, who wear attractive uniforms.

The woman liked the prize-fighter for his honesty, but she learned that she was not the first to fathom his desirability and he was sent on his way. The bank clerk is next in line, a somewhat ungainly fellow with rare ideals regarding love and marriage. He started when he discovered wine and cigarettes on the table and he is told to go elsewhere for the perfect woman. Then the husband of another woman comes on the scene and proved to be as unscrupulous as he was daring, and the "husband of another" passed out of the woman's life.

William S. Hart in "The Narrow Trail," Written by Himself—Stirring Adventure

(Paramount-Artcraft Five Reels)

William Hart in "The Narrow Trail"—this is the attraction at the ——— theatre on ——— of ——— week—William Hart in his latest picture, produced by Paramount under the supervision of Thomas H. Ince. The story was written by Mr. Hart himself, and adapted to the screen by Harvey F. Thew. It is the first story ever written by Mr. Hart and is built around narratives related to him by an early settler in the Dakotas. The one who related the incidents to Mr. Hart is the one who gave him his first lessons in horsemanship. In the production appears the popular impersonator of Western characters, charger Pinto. In the supporting cast are seen Sylvia Bremer, the beautiful Australian actress who has made such a pronounced hit in recent Ince productions. It is a picture of wild outdoor life, bristling with tense situations and thrilling adventure on the Western plains. Ice Harding is the character impersonated by Mr. Hart in this, his latest, production. Ice is a bandit and a leader of men. He is strangely attracted to his horse, Pinto. The sheriff swears to "get" Ice but realizes that he will have trouble catching Pinto. Ice plans a stage hold-up and tells his men that he will accomplish the job alone. He does so and relieves the occupants of their valuables. Among the passengers is "Admiral" Bates, vice king of San Francisco, and his pretty niece, Betty Werdin, who is at heart a good girl and detests luring men to the resort run by her father. Betty offers her jewels to Ice but he refuses to take them. The driver hastens to the nearest town and reports the hold-up. The sheriff gathers his posse and starts after Ice and his gang. Then the excitement starts.

Little Madge Evans and George MacQuarrie in "Gates of Gladness"

(World Five Reel Production)

Madge Evans, the talented child-actress of World Pictures, and George MacQuarrie, well-known character actor, are co-starred in "Gates of Gladness," a late World picture produced under the direction of Harley Knowles. In the supporting roles are seen Niles Welch, Rosina Henley, Gerda Holmes, Baby Joan and Mrs. Stuart Robson. The story was written by Harry Clymer and Harry O. Hoyt and adapted to the screen by Virginia Tyler Hudson. Little Madge Evans has one of the most entrancing roles she has yet interpreted before the camera. It is different from anything she has ever done. She is seen in many of the scenes as a charming little model posing for an artist. The story tells of the manner in which a little girl brings about the reconciliation of two brothers who had been held apart by unwarranted hatred. The brothers both love the same girl. The younger brother wins out but is disowned by his father. A daughter is born, and until she reached the age of eight years she has never been permitted to see her uncle. When she is brought into the lonely home of the bachelor uncle, she brings sunshine with her and replaces the gloom which had held sway since the occupant of the house had been disappointed in love. He is united with his brother and all is happiness. Niles Welch has the role of Myron Leeds, Beth's father. The brother is presented by George MacQuarrie. Gerda Holmes, who has been seen in leading roles in some of the best World productions, has an important part in this picture.

FOR PROGRAMS

Here Is Valuable Matter —If You Will Use It

ON another page of this issue the discussion of house programs is taken up and some interesting advice is given how to tell your patrons in advance about your pictures without telling them too much and thereby taking the edge off their interest.

Of course you can't tell the people about the pictures that are coming unless you know yourself. But you will find these Ad Talks meaty; they give the main essentials you want to know. You can rewrite out of them little phrases for your program and you can get many semi-news items that will go to help your "house gossip."

Use these now—in advance—for that purpose and then clip and file them or index them by using the boxes that appear each week giving the pictures that were covered in the previous issue.

Charles Ray in "The Hired Man," Human Heart-Interest Story

(Paramount Five Reel Production)

Charles Ray is seen in "The Hired Man," written by Julien Josephson, popular writer of short stories, produced by Paramount under the direction of Victor L. Schertzinger, supervised by Thomas H. Ince. The cast includes Charles French, Gilbert Gordon, Lydia Knott, Doris Lee and Carl Ullman. "The Hired Man" is one of the most human, heart interest stories ever told on the screen. Charles Ray is seen to advantage in one of his characteristic roles of the country boob. He has the role of Ezra Hollins, a good natured hired man on the farm of Caleb Endicott. Ezra is a general favorite with the boys. He cherishes the ambition to educate himself, and every spare minute he spends with his books. His employer's daughter, Ruth, returns from boarding school, and she helps Ezra with his lessons. Ezra worships her, but he feels himself unworthy of her, and knows that her father would never approve of the union. Ruth's brother, Walter, in a near-by town, falls into bad company, and, being heavily in debt, embezzles from the local bank. He learns that the bank's books are to be examined, and he implores the aid of Ezra, who is about to leave for college. Ezra gives him all his savings, and goes back to the grind on the farm. The night of the harvest dance arrives. Ruth pleads a headache, because she does not want to attend the dance with her father's choice.

(Triangle Five-Reel Production)

Triangle's late one, "The Hopper," written by Meredith Nicholson, scenarioized by Jack Cunningham, and produced under the direction of Thomas H. Heffron, is a combination of adventure and romance and a bit of mystery. Mong and Louis Durham. Irene Hunt has the part of Muriel Wilton and Preaches Jackson has the role of Roger Livingston Talbot. The two are sweethearts. An elopement resulted and the young couple find happiness in a small bungalow with Roger, Jr. In the outskirts of the city in which lived the hostile fathers, lived "The Hopper," a reformed safe-blower and general all-around crook. His wife was an ex-shoplifter and "The Hopper's" pal, Humpy was given to any branch of slight-of-hand business. The three had combined forces and resolved to go straight. One night the Hopper was returning home when he recognized a detective and believing that he was being followed he jumped into a waiting automobile and made his escape. He discovered that he was guilty of kidnapping for there was a child found in the car. He learns the child's address and returns it, but is captured. The child's mother was Muriel Talbot. She promised the Hopper his freedom if he will turn a trick for her. She plans through him to bring her father and her husband's father together. Does she do it ?

Mary Pickford in Her Best Work Before Camera, "Stella Maris"

(Paramount Five-Reel Production)

Mary Pickford's latest picture is titled "Stella Maris," dramatized from the famous novel by William J. Locke, who is recognized as one of the best authors of the present age. Mr. Locke's novel was adapted for screen presentation by Frances Marion, the clever scenarioist, who has adapted many of Little Mary's biggest successes. The picture was produced for Paramount under the direction of Marshall Neilan, who was responsible for "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm" and "The Little Princess." In the supporting cast are seen: Conway Tearle, as Mary's leading man; Camille Ankewich, Ida Waterman, Herbert Standing, Josephine Crowell and Mrs. Coonleu. "Stella Maris" is pronounced by critics of the best-known motion-picture journals as the best work of Mary Pirkford. Mary has the part of a little orphan, very wealthy, living with her uncle and aunt in a big castle by the sea. Stella Blaunt is her name, but because of the light which was always kept burning in her window, day and night, she was named by a distant relative Stella Maris. Stella was afflicted with a peculiar disease which had paralyzed her from chlidhood and her room was always kept lighted. Because she was kept from the world, Stella developed into an angelic person, very beautiful and pure of heart and mind. John Risca had married unwisely, his wife being addicted to drink. He separated from her, but always had given generously toward her support. He could not get a servant to remain with her because of her beastly temper. He adopts Unity Blake (Mary Pickford. Stella Maris loved John Risca and her childish regard for him developed into the deep love of a woman. Mrs. Risca, now confined in prison for attempting Unity's life, hears of her husband's regard for Stella and tells lies concerning her reputation. Unity hearing of this and knowing that Risca is deeply affected, kills the wife in order to prevent Risca from committing suicide.

Peggy Hyland in Her First Pathe Production, "The Other Woman"

(Pathe Five-Reel Production)

Peggy Hyland makes her appearance in her first Pathe production, "The Other Woman." The story was written by Frederick Arnold Kummer, who is responsible for many well-known screen successes. Philip Bartholomae made the adaptation. The production was made under the direction of Albert Parker. Milton Sills and Anna Lehr are seen in the principal supporting roles. Some of you have seen Miss Hyland in one of her recent productoins, "Persuasive Peggy," and none of you can deny the artistic ability of this little English girl. In "The Other Woman" Miss Hyland has a strong dramatic part, which she handles with true artistry. She presents the part of Eleanor Gates, who has been reared in a small country town and has shown natural talent for painting. In order to perfect her art, Eleanor goes to the city. En route she meets a Mr. Harrington, Wall Street broker, who is on his way to the city and informs Eleanor that he is to be married. The end of the year finds Eleanor a successful painter. That she might judiciously invest her earnings, she calls on Mr. Harrington for advice. Harrington shows an unusual interest in her on the second meeting and he and she are seen together often in the Bohemian quarters. Harrington and his wife gradually drift apart. Eleanor does not realize that she is the cause of the domestic trouble until the Harringtons are at the point of breaking. When she does find out that she is the "other woman" she leaves the city and Harrington and goes back to the country to the sweetheart she left behind.

Peggy Hyland in her first Pathe picture, "The Other Woman," will be seen on the screen of the ——— theatre on ——— of ——— week.

William Duncan Joins Pathe

Will Direct Serials, and Plans to Begin at Once on Western in Which He Will Have Part—Not Named

PATHE'S serial plans, it was announced this week by that company, are now practically completed, and by their magnitude indicate that serials will continue to be a larger feature of the Pathe program than ever before. In accordance with these plans J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager of the Pathe Exchange, has engaged William Duncan, the serial director, who will start at work almost immediately upon a Western serial in which he will not only play the lead, but direct.

Mr. Duncan appeared in "The Fighting Trail," "The Chalice of Courage" and in many features. Pathe regards his acquisition as particularly fortunate, and believes that his ability, united with the Pathe serial experience, will express itself in work far better than any he has yet done. Mr. Duncan is already in preparation on his new serial, which is from the pen of Gilson Willets, author of "The Mystery of the Double Cross," the Pathe serial and several Pathe features, in addition to many dramatic stories for other concerns.

The first serial to be released by Pathe in 1918 will be the Pearl White serial, "The House of Hate," in which Miss White and Antonio Moreno will play the leads. The release date will be in the early Spring. "The House of Hate" is being produced for Pathe by the Astra Film Corporation. The serial has been given a cast which includes Paul Clerget, Peggy Shanor, J. H. Gilmour and other well-known actors. The early episodes have now been finished.

William Duncan, Whom Pathe Has Placed Under Contract

The serial in which Mr. Duncan will be starred, and which he will direct, has not yet been named, but it will be released in the late Spring.

Another forthcoming Pathe serial, the cast of which has not yet been selected, will be based on the novel, "The Mystery of Lucian Delorme," by Guy de Taramond.

Other important announcements concerning Pathe serial plans are expected to be made later.

Theda Bara Returns to the West Coast

THE first week in February has been set as the approximate time of the leaving of Theda Bara, the William Fox star, for Hollywood, Cal., where she is expected to begin work on a new super-production which the Fox management considers affords her greater opportunities for display of dramatic talent than she has had in any of her previous dramas, including "Cleopatra," "The Rose of Blood" and others.

Miss Bara has been in the East since last October, having come from California to witness the opening of "Cleopatra" at the Lyric theatre in New York. During this time she has made two super-productions, "The Forbidden Path," which was released January 27 as a Standard picture, and "The Soul of Buddha," which is to be released April 7.

The latter production—scenario and story—was written by Miss Bara while she was traveling across the continent from California. It deals with life and conditions in Java and is said to strongly develop the Oriental atmosphere. Work on this super-production was completed last week.

J. Gordon Edwards, Miss Bara's director, already is in California, having left New York about January 16. Some of the members of the director's staff also have left New York, so that all arrangements for beginning work will have been completed by the time Miss Bara reaches Hollywood. The actress will remain in the West indefinitely.

Reports Success

Reports from the Pathe Company indicate a highly satisfactory amount of business being done on their re-issue of "Les Misérables."

Max Linder Recovers from Illness

Max Linder, the French comedian, who terminated his contract with Essanay last July on account of ill health, has cabled to friends that he has now fully recovered and that he expects to visit this country again in April.

After making a few productions at his own studio, the Cinemax, in Paris, M. Linder repaired himself to Switzerland, and will now sail for the United States in a few months. Just which company will present him is still a point of conjecture.

New Bennett-Ince Story Is Begun

It was announced last week from the office of Famous Players-Lasky that work has been started at the Thomas H. Ince studios in California on the second Paramount picture starring Buid Bennett. Jerome Storm is directing the picture, under Mr. Ince's supervision, and Earl Rodney will appear with Miss Bennett again. The scenes are laid in a small Kansas town, and it is said that many rural types will be introduced.

The working title of Miss Bennett's first subject is "The Keys of the Righteous," but no name has been given to the second one.

"The Rough Lover" for Franklyn Farnum

With a new leading woman in the person of Juanita Hansen, Franklyn Farnum takes his regular place on the Bluebird program in "The Rough Lover," by Joseph F. Poland, and which was put into scenario form by Charles A. Kenyon.

"The Rough Lover" was produced by Joseph DeGrasse. Franklyn Farnum has a dual role. In one character he is a studious book-worm, timid of women, and uncertain of himself. In the other he is a prize-fighter, sure of himself, and the more women he knows the more agreeable he finds life.

Ralph Kellard Returns to Pathe

Ralph Kellard has returned to the screen, and will make his reappearance in pictures under the Pathe banner, in a forthcoming five-reel Pathe Play.

Previous to his return to the stage this season, Mr. Kellard was with Pathe for two years, having been in "The Shielding Shadow," "Pearl of the Army," and "The Precious Packet."

William Fox Cuts "Les Miserables" Down

William Fox announced this week that he could not cut "Les Miserables" to eight reels, and as a consequence the picture will go to exhibitors in nine short reels. Its total length, as the work stands completed, is substantially 8,400 feet, approximately 1,381 feet having been eliminated. This is about 400 feet short of the cuts which it had been proposed to make.

"Shortening this picture to bring it within the length requirements of exhibitors has been one of the most difficult and heart-rending tasks ever imposed upon our organization," said William Fox this week in the course of an interview. "Mr. Lloyd, the director, thought the limit had been reached when he turned the production over to us. The film then measured 13,000 feet. For the showing at the Lyric Theatre in New York City we managed to cut it to 9,781 feet, and our opinion then was that we could not possibly take out another inch.

"We realized, however, that further curtailment would be expected before the picture was released and accordingly a very careful and exhaustive study of the possibilities was made during the whole of the time the production was being run in New York. We sought opinions from everyone. Representatives of all departments of our organization saw the picture repeatedly, and finally, just prior to the last Lyric showing, all of these persons made a final inspection of the film and then submitted detailed written reports suggesting every sort of cutting or trimming which they considered feasible."

General Sends Out Another Chaplin

General Film Company declares that the Essanay comedy releases for the current week are rich in those elements which appeal to showmen. To head the list General has chosen Charlie Chaplin in a reissue of his picture called "A Woman," made while the comedian was with Essanay. This is the sixth of Essanay's reissues of Chaplin's early pictures.

The Essanay comedy for the week is "A Touch Knight," described by General as a farce with plenty of action.

Ethel Burton in Billy West Comedy

In the next Billy West King-Bee comedy, entitled "The Rogue," which is scheduled for release February 15, Ethel Burton, who was the King-Bee's leading lady in the first production of this company, returns to be made love to by the star. Another woman seen in some of the earlier King-Bee comedies, Rosemary Theby by name, appears in the same picture.

"Any Home" Release Set

"Any Home," the Pathe Gold Rooster Play, starring Baby Marie Osborne, has been scheduled for release on March 3 Pathe announced this week.

George Loane Tucker, Goldwyn's Managing Director of Productions

George Loane Tucker Promoted

Goldwyn Makes Him Managing Director of Production—Will Shape Entire Output of Company—Supervise Releases

GEORGE LOANE TUCKER, one of the better known directors and producers in the motion picture industry, has become managing director for Goldwyn Pictures Corporation, it was announced this week by that company. He will, it is understood, have oversight and supervision of all the company's releases.

In announcing the new arrangement, Goldwyn said:—"From the earliest days of Goldwyn Mr. Tucker has taken a vital interest in the company because he felt then and now that it presented one of the greatest opportunities for screen achievement in the entire industry, and because he was in entire harmony with the Goldwyn plan of making only quality productions.

"That George Loane Tucker should step into this important post is of great value to Goldwyn for many reasons, not merely because he is an able and brilliant director, but because he is one of the greatest judges of story values for the screen as well as a master of continuity—one of the most difficult and exacting details of the picture art. The assumption of these increased duties by Mr. Tucker fortunately will not win him exemption from personally producing pictures, for he will continue to make a definite number of releases for Goldwyn in its annual scheduled output. But, in addition, he is to give his careful and patient attention to all other Goldwyn productions, and this will unquestionably greatly increase the Goldwyn average of excellence.

"Already Mr. Tucker has produced two splendid pictures for Goldwyn—Mae Marsh in 'The Cinderella Man' and Mabel Normand in 'Dodging a Million.'"

Universal Moves "Morgan's Raiders"

A change in the Bluebird schedule of release brings "Morgan's Raiders," the latest Violet Mersereau subject to be completed, into a much earlier release date than had previously been set. It will now be released the week of February 18, according to announcements.

"Morgan's Raiders" was written for Miss Mersereau by Bess Meredith, and directed by Wilfred Lucas. Immediately upon its completion Mr. Lucas was given a contract to direct Bluebirds, and was sent to Universal City, where he took charge of the direction of Monroe Salisbury.

Miss Mersereau is supported by Frank Holland in the character of Harry Dawley, Barbara Gilroy as Betsy's cousin Virginia, and Edward Burns as John Davidson, the Union captain.

You are not going to war. The men who are need all the comforts you can give them. Help them get cigarettes. That is your patriotic duty. If you aren't helping in the "smokes" campaign, get busy—now. Don't be a slacker!

Triangle Directors Gain Lap

Three Subjects Were Completed Within the Past Week, With William Desmond, Belle Bennett and Jack Livingston

ACCORDING to announcements from the West Coast this week Triangle feature directors have gained a lap on the production schedule set by Vice-President and General Manager H. O. Davis for the Culver City studios during the new year, completing three subjects in the past week. The schedule calls for two features a week. The stories on which the directors have finished shooting and which are now in the film editing department include "The Sea Panther," "A Soul in Trust" and "The Hard Rock Breed."

In "The Sea Panther," directed by Thomas Heffron, William Desmond is featured as a swashbuckling pirate of the days of Captain Kidd, and will be seen treading the decks of the historic old Barkentine, "Fremont," which is the veteran of more than a hundred motion pictures. Mary Warren, who has been with the Triangle forces for some time, makes her initial appearance as leading woman in this picture, and is said to have accomplished exceptional work in her first big part. The well-known Triangle villain, Jack Richardson, is included in the cast.

Belle Bennett is taking a few days' vacation with the completion of "A Soul in Trust," a seven-reel Southern society drama, directed by Gilbert P. Hamilton. Miss Bennett has nearly a dozen changes of costume, and a bridal gown that is said to be a masterpiece of modiste's skill. The cast includes J. Barney Sherry, Darrell Foss, Lee Hill, Lillian West and Grover Franke.

Director Raymond Wells made record time on his latest Triangle offering, "The Hard Rock Breed," a film adaptation of Frederic Bechdolt's Saturday Evening Post story of the same name. This feature picture was completed with one week of location work at the stone quarries at Colton, Cal., and another week spent at the Culver City studios. Jack Livingston has the lead. J. Barney Sherry and Jack Curtis are the two typical "hard rock" men in the story. The cast also includes Margery Wilson, who recently starred in "Wild Sumac" and "Flames of Chance," and "Bull" Durham, Aaron Edwards and Lee Phelps.

Director Cliff Smith has finished his exterior "shots" on his latest Western "Faith Endurin'," featuring the cowboy star, Roy Stewart, and is now working on one of the glass stages at the Culver City studios. A rodeo and round-up at the ranch studio, Hartville, was a feature of the opening scenes in this new Western feature, written by Kenneth B. Clarke. A surprise was sprung by Director Smith on his cowboys when he ordered one of the horses used on the stage coach to be saddled for the bucking contest. Two of the punchers were thrown before they discovered that their director had put one over on them and worked in a well-known "outlaw."

Norma Talmadge Completes Feature

After five days of enforced idleness at the Norma Talmadge studios in East Forty-eighth street, work was resumed this week on "By Right of Purchase," Miss Talmadge's next Select production, in which she will be presented by Joseph M. Schenck.

The picture will be practically completed by the end of the week.

Gloria Swanson Appears in "Smoke"

Gloria Swanson has the featured part in "Smoke," a Triangle picturization of Norman Sherbrook's magazine story of the same name made by Charles Mortimer Peck. Director Jack Dillon conscripted the comedienne from the Triangle-Keystone forces, where she had but recently returned. Edward Peale, who makes his initial appearance under the Triangle banner as Miss Swanson's leading man, is well known to motion pictures.

Two other discoveries of Casting Director Hoyt are Jim Cope and Grover Franke, who also have substantial parts. The cast includes George Hernandez, seen in a recent release, "The Hopper"; Claire McDowell, Jack Richardson, Darrell Foss, Kitty Bradbury, Bliss Chevalier and Iris Ashton.

Coal Shortage Sends Reid West

Wallace Reid, who recently started work at the New York studios of the Famous Players-Lasky Studio following his tour of the country, last week left for California. Under the direction of Donald Crisp, Mr. Reid commenced activities on his new Paramount picture in the East, but owing to conditions brought about by the coal situation, it was decided that he discontinue operation here.

Ann Pennington's Film Progresses

Ann Pennington's newest Paramount picture, "Sunshine Nan," is now rapidly nearing completion in the Famous Players-Lasky New York studios.

In the cast are Richard Bathelmes, John Hines, Helen Tracy, and Charles Eldridge. Charles Giblyn is directing the films, the scenario having been written by Eve Unsell.

Vitagraph Makes Ambitious Plans

Sixteen New Five-Reel Subjects Outlined in Addition to "Over the Top"—Enough to Fill Company's Program to First of August

FOLLOWING the announcement of March releases, an ambitious program of production which will carry Blue Ribbon features well into the summer, was made public this week by Albert E. Smith, president of the Vitagraph Company. His statement not only shows a great many plays actually in the making, but many others in preparation for the company's extensive list of stars.

Sixteen new five-reel subjects are outlined in President Smith's announcement, and these, with "Over the Top," in which Sergeant Guy Empey and Lois Meredith are to appear, and the patriotic feature which is being made in conjunction with New York State, gives Vitagraph material to fill its program to August 1.

Six Months Ahead

A summary of the Vitagraph future product shows that the company not only is prepared for almost six months in advance, but also that its projected features are claimed to be of extraordinary high merit from a literary standpoint.

Director William P. S. Earle, under whose guidance Gladys Leslie has worked ever since she joined the Vitagraph family, will start production next week on "The Reflection of Scarlet," an original story by Edward P. Smaney, who is now actively engaged in the Photographic Department at Washington on special work for the Government. Miss Leslie is to be starred in this feature, which will be produced in five reels, and upon its conclusion will begin work immediately on "Ann Acushla," of which Paul West is the author. "Ann Acushla" is described as a charming story of Irish-American life.

Alice Joyce, who is nearing the end of her work in "The Son of the Soul," under the direction of Tom Terriss, is scheduled to begin work in "My Man," an adaptation of the play by Edith Ellis. Her role in this, it is said, will give Miss Joyce one of the finest opportunities she has had since her portrayal of Mary Turner in "Within the Law." Other plays which are in preparation for Miss Joyce are "The Business of Life," by Robert W. Chambers, and "To the Highest Bidder," a novel by Florence Morse Kingsley.

MacGrath Novel Used

George Barr McCutcheon and Harold MacGrath supply the subjects in which Earle Williams will be featured with Grace Darmond, following the completion of "An American Live Wire," on which they are at work now in California. "An American Live Wire" is an adaptation from "The Lotus and the Bottle," an O. Henry story. "The Man from Brodneys," from the novel of the same name, by McCutcheon, probably will be the next story in which Mr. Williams will work, this to be followed by "The Girl in His House," from the pen of Harold MacGrath. Another feature in prospect for Mr. Williams and Miss Darmond is entitled "Out of the Dark," written by Roma Raymond and Jane Dixon. All of these, it is announced, will be produced at the Vitagraph Western Studio under the direction of Tom Mills, who also is directing "An American Live Wire."

Corinne Griffith, Webster Campbell and Marc MacDermott, working under the direction of John Robertson, are nearing completion of the patriotic picture which is being made by Vitagraph in co-operation with the New York State Defense Council. This is the feature in which Governor Charles S. Whitman, of New York, plays a prominent role, and it promises to be one of the most sensational pictures of the year. The story was prepared by Robert W. Chambers from actual spy records in the New York State archives, and he, with suggestions from Albert E. Smith, has provided a story that is said to be replete with thrilling incidents.

"The Green God" Included

Upon completion of this picture Director Robertson will resume production of "The Green God," featuring Miss Griffith and Webster Campbell, work upon which was interrupted in order to start the New York State feature. "The Green God" is based on the novel of Frederick Arnold Kummer and is said to provide Miss Griffith with a splendid chance to display her talents.

Following "The Green God," Miss Griffith will be put in the leading role of "The Clutch of Circumstance," from the novel by Leighton Graves Osmun. Mr. Robertson also will direct her in this feature.

Harry Morey, with Florence Deshon, is scheduled to begin work on "The Cambric Mask," one of Robert W. Chambers's novels, immediately upon completion of "The Desired Woman," which he is now making under direction of Paul Scardon. Another story which is ready for Mr. Morey and Miss Deshon is "The Man from Where," an original story by Frederic R. Buckley, staff writer in the Vitagraph scenario department.

William Duncan, the stalwart hero of "The Fighting Trail" and "Vengeance—and the Woman," the two Western serials, has been selected to play the leading role in the screen adaptation of "Baree, the Son of Kazan," the novel of the North by James Oliver Curwood.

Work on the "Kazan" feature, which will have a great many snow scenes in it, is scheduled to start within a very short time, the Vitagraph announcement states.

Shipman-Whitman Feature

Nell Shipman and Alfred Whitman are to be featured in "A Texan Romance," by Cyrus Townsend Brady and "The Pariah," by Lowell Otis Reese. The former is said to be an unusually strong story, containing many thrilling moments such as the author gave to "The Fighting Trail," which he wrote in collaboration with J. Stuart Blackton, and "Vengeance—and the Woman," of which he was co-author with Albert E. Smith. "The Pariah" is an adaptation from the story of the same name which created great interest when it appeared in the Saturday Evening Post last August. Both these stories are said to be ideally adapted to the talents of Miss Shipman and Mr. Whitman, who are now at work under direction of William Wolbert on "The Home Trail," scheduled for release late in March. The stars will be directed by Mr. Wolbert in both of the new features.

Mutual's stars, William Russell, Mary Miles Minter, Ann Murdock, Edna Goodrich, Margarita Fischer, Olive Tell and Billie Rhodes, continue to elicit praise, according to Mutual, from the exhibitors.

Mary Pickford, Artcraft Star, Swung the Baton and 'Frisco's Red Cross Parade Followed

Mary Pickford Leads Parade

Is Guest of San Francisco Two Days, and Marches on Foot with Soldiers and Sailors—Attended Reception

FOR the second time within the past few weeks Mary Pickford has headed a parade in San Francisco, wielding a baton which Famous Players-Lasky Corporation describes as big as herself at the head of a military band.

Miss Pickford was the official guest of San Francisco for two days recently, during a Red Cross drive. The big event of the drive on "Mary Pickford Day" was the military and naval parade, which was headed by Miss Pickford and in which fully ten thousand soldiers and sailors took part. There were no vehicles in the parade.

When the head of the parade reached the St. Francis Hotel, the Artcraft star entered an automobile and stood in the tonneau while the boys in olive drab and blue passed in review, each company saluting her with "eyes left" as it passed.

In the afternoon a reception was tendered Miss Pickford by San Francisco's society and club women at the Colonial ballroom of the St. Francis. There was dancing, Miss Pickford starting it by asking a sailor boy from the escort of thirty bluejackets tendered her for the occasion, for the first dance.

The following day, Miss Pickford was hurried off by the Red Cross officials to the Union Iron Works, The Pacific Coast's shipbuilding plant, where she spoke to about 15,000 workingmen now engaged in building warships for our navy. No notice had been given of the meeting, only a sign in front of the general offices saying, "Mary Pickford will speak here this noon."

Suffrage Theme in Pathe Drama Series

AN argument for woman suffrage is said to be contained in "The Catspaw," the third chapter of "The Price of Folly," the series of eight two-reel dramas, each complete in itself, being released by Pathe, according to Frank Mayo. Mr. Mayo is co-starred in "The Price of Folly" with Ruth Roland in this serial.

"'The Catspaw' deals with the work of the crooked politician," said Mr. Mayo, "and this brand of politician will be a thing of the past when women get the vote and begin to take the interest they should in the things that concern the welfare of their country.

"The drama is not based on woman suffrage, but the thinking person, who sees it, will realize that politics must be reformed and their reformation will come through giving women the vote. 'The Catspaw' is only one of the vital topics of to-day which are made the theme for the two-reel dramas released under the general name of 'The Price of Folly.'"

During the last five years Mr. Mayo has played in about 400 feature pictures. He played his first big part in pictures as Max Lamar in Will M. Ritchey's serial, "The Red Circle," one of Pathe's continued photoplay releases. He also played opposite Ruth Roland in this serial.

"The Price of Folly" is from the pen of Will M. Ritchey, responsible for many stories. It was released January 20, and from reports from various sections of the country it is a winner. Marcus Loew booked it for a pre-release showing at his circuit of theatres in and around New York City and it elicited most favorable comment.

Goldwyn Distributes New Beach Film

Goldwyn Distributing Corporation this week announced the completion of another Rex Beach film drama, "Heart of the Sunset," made from the author's novel of that name. Unlike "The Auction Block," which was purchased from the Rex Beach Pictures Company and released as a regularly scheduled Goldwyn subject, "Heart of the Sunset" is to be distributed as a special Rex Beach production, it is said.

Anna Q. Nilsson is the featured feminine player in "Heart of the Sunset." In the leading masculine role—the Rex Beach pictures have no stars, so-called—is Herbert Heyes.

Petrova Issues Folder on Pictures

An advertising folder has just been issued by the exploitation department of the Petrova Picture Co. Daniel M. Henderson, advertising manager, is responsible for this novelty. The folder is so arranged as to not only serve as an argument to all exhibitors regarding the merit of the productions starring Madame Olga Petrova, but is also most suitable for distribution by the theatre man to his patrons.

The outside cover carries a personal letter from S. L. Rothapfel, managing director of the Rialto and Rivoli theatres, concerning qualities of the first Petrova production, "Daughter of Destiny."

Theda Bara Departs from Vampirism

Theda Bara does not have a vampire role in her super-production, "The Forbidden Path," which will be released by William Fox as a Standard picture on January 27. Instead, she is the victim of a vampire—that is, provided a man may be given that name. The role, according to the Fox management, is wholly a sympathetic one in which Miss Bara portrays a woman who has been robbed of honor by a rich man and then trod upon by society.

Pickford Subject Promises Humor

Famous Players-Lasky is of the opinion, in an announcement this week, that "Amarilly of Clothes Line Alley," in which Mary Pickford will next appear for Artcraft, is the most humorous picture in which she has ever appeared. "Clothes Line Alley" is said to be typical of the tenement district of a great metropolis. The characters that appear, from the star down, are all indigenous to the precincts that form so large and so picturesque a portion of the city.

Leonce Perret Directs Dolly Sisters

Leonce Perret, who came to this country about a year ago to direct Robert Warwick in a series of pictures, is now actively engaged in the production of a feature in which the Dolly Sisters are the stars, it was announced this week by T. E. Letendre. The scenario was written by M. Perret.

"Revenge," With Edith Storey; "Her Boy," With Niles Welch As Co-Star, and "Under Suspicion," With Bushman and Bayne, Are New Features From the Metro Studios

Author Named Petrova New Subject

The publicity department of Petrova Pictures Corporation this week announced that through an error inadvertently committed by a member of the studio staff of the company, credit for the titling of the second feature starring Madame Olga Petrova, was misplaced last week. "The Light Within," the title which was chosen in competition and approved by Frederick L. Collins, president of the Petrova Picture Co. organization, and the star herself, was erroneously ascribed as the work of Larry Trimble, who directed the production.

To Mrs. L. Case Russell, author of the scenario of "The Light Within," which is an adaptation of her original story, "Laurel Carlisle," should go the credit of choosing this title.

"Love Me" from Quill of Sullivan

C. Gardner Sullivan, who has written many photoplays, is responsible for "Love Me," in which Thomas H. Ince will present Dorothy Dalton on the Paramount program following her appearance in "Flare-Up Sal."

The picture, under the supervision of Mr. Ince, is directed by R. William Neil, who is said to have a remarkably well selected cast at his disposal. The players in support of Miss Dalton have not been announced.

The story of "Love Me" ranges from the social precincts of Philadelphia to the wilds of a North Dakota construction camp.

Vitagraph Introduces New Players

Florence Deshon and Grace Darmond, who were recently added to the list of Vitagraph stars, are to be introduced on that company's program the week of February 4, when they will appear in support of Harry Morey in "The Other Man," a Blue Ribbon.

"Brass Check" Cast Is Named

Will S. Davis Directs Metro Production Which Co-Stars Bushman and Bayne—Frank Currier as the Father

METRO PICTURES CORPORATION this week announced the members of the cast to appear with Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne in the production called "The Brass Check," which has been put under way with Will S. Davis directing. The story was prepared for the screen by June Mathis from a magazine story.

Frank Currier, a Metro favorite, is cast as Silas Trevor, father of A. Richard Trevor (played by Francis X. Bushman) and head of the rubber trust. Currier has just completed another "father" role, playing Pharos, the parent of Azah, the gypsy girl portrayed by Nazimova, in her second Metro picture. He has supported many of the Metro stars in picture productions, including Nazimova in "Revelation," Emily Stevens in "Outwitted," and Emmy Wehlen in "The Trail of the Shadow."

Robert Williamson plays Peter Glanor, a friend of Silas Trevor, and one of the directors of the rubber trust. He recently appeared on the screen with George Walsh in "The Pride of New York."

Ollie Cooper, who plays Norma Glanor, daughter of Peter Glanor, makes her motion picture debut in this picture. Miss Cooper, who comes from California, has had extensive experience in stock in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Portland, Ore., and other cities.

Augustus Phillips, often a member of Metro casts, is seen as Wellington Dix. He was recently seen as Dr. David Brett in Metro's picturization of "Daybreak," in which Emily Stevens was starred. He has played in all except one of Viola Dana's Eastern Metro pictures, including "Blue Jeans."

John Smiley plays William Roberts, a director of the rubber syndicate. Smiley has previously supported Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne in "The Adopted Son" and "Their Compact."

Hugh D'Arcy, the veteran actor, press agent, advance man and theatrical manager, is a notable addition to this cast. He plays J. Osborne Cole, a member of the rubber company directorate. He has been advance man for Edward Harrigan, Robert Mantell, Liebler & Co., the Rogers Brothers and the Shuberts.

Frank Joyner plays Henry Everett, a young inventor, the brother of Edith Everett, who is portrayed by Beverly Bayne, co-star with Mr. Bushman in "The Brass Check." Joyner recently supported Emily Stevens in two Metro pictures.

Rudolph de Cordova plays Cornelius Everett, father of Edith and Henry. He was Shakespearean advisor for the Metro production of "Romeo and Juliet," in which Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne played the famous lovers.

Jack Newton, recently seen in "Under Suspicion," with Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne, and "Alias Mrs. Jessop," with Emily Stevens, plays Robert Dexter, the head of the Dexter Detective Agency.

Besides the principals there is a large cast of minor players, who will appear as farmers, detectives, tramps, lunatics, and so forth.

Flagg's Model in Edison Story

For the fourth of the series of pictures which James Montgomery Flagg is sketching for Edison under the general title of "Girls You Know," the artist selected Mary Arthur, the girl who has done most of the posing for his recent drawings, as the chief figure. This marks her first appearance in pictures.

The three pictures already made are "The Screen Fan," with Eleanor Masters; "The Bride," with Peggy Hopkins, and "The Superstitious Girl," with Hazel Adams.

Possessing a Catchy Name and a Star With Personality, "Dodging a Million," Goldwyn's First Mabel Normand Picture, Awaits Release for Approval

Goldwyn Rushes Plans on Normand Film

DECLARING that word of the forthcoming release of Mabel Normand's "Dodging a Million" subject has brought forth response from many exhibitors, Goldwyn Pictures Corporation this week announced that the company deemed it imperative to follow the picture up with a second Mabel Normand production as soon as is practicable.

Accordingly, Goldwyn announces a new story has been chosen for the comedienne, which is said to tell a tale of newspaper life combining comedy and thrills. The role for Miss Normand is that a "copy girl," whose sudden and brilliant "beat" covers her paper with glory—and the star with fame.

Clarence G. Badger, brought from the West Coast by Goldwyn, has been selected to direct the picture, which as yet is without a title. Badger was formerly with Lubin, Universal and Keystone as writer of scenarios, and has directed comedies for the latter company.

Tom Moore will be Miss Normand's leading man in this "newspaper" story, and Charlotte Granville is cast as his mother. Helen Dahl, from the ranks of the legitimate stage, also has a role, and Louis R. Grisel has the part of an old newspaper employee. Willard Dashiell, Lincoln Plumer and Wallace McCutcheon, all well known to the screen, are other players in the cast.

Keystone Makes Hay While Sun Shines

FAVORED by the delay in California rains, the Triangle-Keystone forces have been making hay while the sun shines. Five companies are busy at the Culver City studio on the schedule of comedies which S. C. Burr, comedy production manager, has mapped out for the present year.

A company under the direction of Herman Raymaker is completing work on the two-reel comedy "A Playwright's Wrong," in which one of the scenic features is the interior of a motion picture theatre. Much of the action, which prepared the way for a series of situations, takes place within this specially constructed palace of silent fun.

Triangle-Keystone Director Charles Avery has a big cast at work on a "society-crook" comedy, "Her Bohemian Party." Ruth Langston plays the principal feminine role, a society girl whose longing for new sensations leads to many harrowing and laughable experiences. Eugene Corey, as her sweetheart, and Arthur Moon, as a suave leader of a band of discriminating crooks, have good roles. Others in the cast are Al Harris, Joseph Belmont, Jim Rowe and Cliff Jordan.

Director Reggie Morris, who contracted a severe attack of grippe during the holiday season, is back at work on a one-reel comedy, "Three Hats and Two Heads." In the cast are Rae Godfrey, Frank Bonn, Mario Bianchi, Rose Carter, Martin Kinney and Marianne Torre.

"A Rough Diamond," with Paddy McQuire, headed by a big cast of well-known fun makers, is having its finishing touches adjusted by Director Harry Edwards. Many of the scenes were "shot" at one of the jewelry shops of the West.

Director William Beaudine has his latest two-reeler, "Slinging It," almost ready for the cutters.

Farnum Company Goes to Mountains

Headed by William Farnum, the William Fox star, and Richard Stanton, who is directing his new de luxe production, "Rough and Ready," now in the making, a company of eighty-five players and technical men left New York City last week for the Adirondack Mountains. The scenes of the photoplay, which will probably be released late in March as a Standard picture, are laid for the most part in the icy wastes of the frozen North. Mr. Fox says, in consequence, that Mr. Farnum will spend at least a fortnight and possibly three weeks in the snowclad region.

Balshofer Completes Lockwood Subject

With the filmization of a few remaining scenes which had to be made in New York, following two location trips and a long period of work in the studio, the production of Harold Lockwood's coming Metro wonder play, "Broadway Bill," was completed last week by Director Fred J. Balshofer.

The cast supporting Mr. Lockwood includes Martha Mansfield, Stanton Heck, Cornish Beck, William Clifford, Bert Starkey, Tom Blake, Art Ortego, Robert Milosh, Raymond Hadley, W. W. Black and Blanche Davenport.

The production has been made in five reels and is scheduled as a February release by Metro.

Goldwyn Engages Henley to Direct

Goldwyn Pictures Corporation, in making arrangements for a new production in which Mae Marsh will be presented, has included the engagement of Hobart Henley as director. A contract has been signed whereby Henley will direct Miss Marsh's future Goldwyn features.

Besides his directing proclivities, which have been shown in "Parentage," a state rights picture, Mr. Henley has also appeared in motion pictures, lastly with Universal.

The cast for the new picture is now being assembled.

"The Shuttle" Nears Final Touches

"The Shuttle," Constance Talmadge's latest Select picture, in which she will be presented by Lewis J. Selznick, has been completed and is now being cut and titled. It is the first production to be made by the star since her arrival in Los Angeles and provides her with a role of unusual dramatic force, according to Select.

The story was written by Margaret Turnbull and Harvey Thew from Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's novel of international love and marriage, and was directed by Rollin Sturgeon.

"Evidence" Changed to "The Argument"

The Triangle Film Corporation announces that the title of the play, "Evidence," released for the week of January 20, has been changed to "The Argument." "The Argument" is described as a drama of professional life, offering an entirely new theme for a dramatic production, and involves an interesting study of brainstorm acquittal. The principal characters are J. Barney Sherry, who plays the part of a well-known New York attorney, and little Pauline Starke, recently featured in "Until They Get Me."

Franklin Assists Director Davis

Harry Franklin is assisting Will S. Davis in the direction of Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne, "The Brass Check," a picturization of George Allan England's story of the same name that appeared in All-Story Weekly. Franklin has returned to the Metro field after a vacation. He has previously assisted Director Davis in the production of "Alias Mrs. Jessop" in which Emily Stevens was the star.

Oklahoma Oil Fields for Paralta

Paralta Plays, Inc., last week announced that many of the big spectacular scenes in J. Warren Kerrigan's forthcoming Paralta play, "The Turn of a Card," are laid in the oil fields of Oklahoma. In the role of Jimmy Montgomery Farrell, Mr. Kerrigan is seen as a young college man who goes West and strikes oil in the Oklahoma fields. During the progress of the story the men employed at the wells become incensed and start a riot, during which they set fire to one of the great wells.

Brockwell Company Under Way

Fox Western Studios Scene of Action on Story Unnamed, with Le Saint Directing—Tom Mix Completes Feature

GLADYS BROCKWELL has begun work on a new production at the William Fox studios on the Pacific Coast. The story and scenario are by Charles Kenyon, but the picture has not been named. Edward J. Le Saint is the director, this being his second picture for Mr. Fox. The cast includes, besides Miss Brockwell, William Scott, Bertram Bracken, Lucille Young, Georgia Woodthrop, T. A. Crittenden, Sarah Hernan and Betro Buzzi.

Miss Brockwell began work three days after completing "The Moral Law," under the direction of Bertram Bracken. This story was by E. Lloyd Sheldon and the cast includes Rosita Marstini, Joseph Singleton, Frank Clark and Nancy Caswell among others.

Photographing has been completed for the Tom Mix production to be released under the title "Six-Shooter Andy." This story was written by Bernard McConville, and the picture was made under S. A. Franklin's direction. The cast, which is a large one, includes several of the children who had principal roles in "Jack and the Beanstalk," "Treasure Island" and similar Fox productions, among these being Georgia Stone, Virginia Corbin, Violet Radcliffe, Buddie Messinger, Lewis Sargent, Raymond Lee, Beulah Burns and Vivian Plank. Among the adults in the company, besides Mr. Mix, were Enid Markey, one of the stars of "Cheating the Public," Bert Woodruff, Sam Degrasse, Patrick Christmas, Robert Fleming, Jack Plank, Charles Stephens and Benn Hammer.

Alice Brady Starts New Select Picture

ALICE BRADY on January 23 started work on her fourth Select production in the Fifty-sixth street studio, following the five-day shutdown of studios made necessary by the order of the Fuel Administrator. The newest of Miss Brady's Select Pictures will follow respectively "Her Silent Sacrifice," "Woman and Wife" (a screen version of "Jane Eyre"), and "The Knife," a picturization of Eugene Walter's play of the same name recently seen here.

The next Brady production is to be Russian in theme and setting. Robert G. Vignola, who directed "The Knife," which has only recently been completed, will again have charge of the Brady production. Frank Morgan will be the leading man; he was likewise leading man in "The Knife."

Although a great many of the scenes in Alice Brady's new picture, which, for the present, is being called "Ruthless Russia," will be exteriors in which winter scenery forms a pictorial background, the scenes filmed during the first week or two of work will be interiors done at the studio. This for the reason that some of the personnel of the Brady company, who are necessary in these interior scenes but not in the exterior, are at liberty only for a short time, and Miss Brady and her director wish to avail themselves of their services before their engagements call them away.

Among the company, which is only partly assembled, may be noted, besides Miss Brady and Mr. Morgan, Charles Francis, Harry Southard and Russell Bassett, all of whom are necessary for the scenes about to be filmed.

"Camera Face Born, Not Made"—Petrova

MADAME OLGA PETROVA, the emotional artiste now appearing in a series of eight special starring productions of her own film organization, last week presented some personal views regarding the topic of "type" and "camera face." Madame Petrova's pictures thus far are "Daughter of Destiny" and "The Light Within," with "The Life Mask" in preparation.

She said: "A 'camera face' is like little Topsy of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' fame—'it just growed that way.' One may have the beauty of the Queen of Sheba, Venus de Milo, Cleopatra and Helen of Troy rolled into one and still not have a 'camera face.' The essential thing is to have features that photograph well. In every day life, a little droop to the mouth or a peculiar angle to the eyebrows may add charm and character to one's looks, yet on the screen these lines may have a very ugly effect. If the features are quite clear and regular there is something to hope for—and even them, with the most perfectly shaped nose and lips, it may be discovered that the big blue eyes, that caused everybody to remark on their 'soulful beauty,' look weak and faded on the screen. Certain shades of blue will not do at all. Black eyes photograph dull and lifeless; brown eyes are better; but blue-green eyes, with a rim of yellow around the pupil are best of all, as they retain their expression and animation. Black hair is not desirable, as it is too 'contrasty'; brown, red and blond photograph well, though much depends on the shade and quality."

General Sets No Thrill Limit on Serial

GENERAL FILM COMPANY, in its most recent announcements concerning "A Daughter of Uncle Sam," the Jaxon serial, sets no thrill limits on the picture, but expects it to be the thrill sensation of the year.

General said: "Preliminary inspection of the first six episodes of 'A Daughter of Uncle Sam,' released through General Film Company, reinforce the producers' confidence, expressed some time ago, that this new serial is to be the thrill sensation of the year. Each episode is crowded with tense and dramatic situations well calculated to hold the fans glued in their seats. Besides, many of the German spy outrages figuring in the serial are among those dealt with in the columns of the Providence Journal during its stirring series of exposures.

"Jane Vance, the heroine of this exciting serial, is a sportswoman whose feats will endear her with fans who are looking for new sensations. A few of the many exciting events in the early chapters of "A Daughter of Uncle Sam" are:

"A race on ice between an automobile and an ice boat; a collision at sea between a yacht and a motor boat; the theft of the Government secret code by spies; the destruction of a munitions plant by bombs planted by a German agent; the arrest of the plotters and their escape from jail with the aid of explosives; the ingenious attempts of plotters to obtain the secret of the theoscope, a marvelous war invention; the rescue of the inventor from a rock rapidly being enveloped by a tide; a disastrous fire started by German agents; an attempt to 'get' the hero by cutting down a tree from which he is making observations; the round-up and capture of members of the spy gang; a saw mill scene, in which the master spy puts the heroine at the mercy of the machinery; a fight atop an ice covered rock between the hero and the master spy and the former's thirty-foot fall into the arms of soldiers below, a clever ruse by which the heroine throws the enemy off guard and sends a wireless call for help, and the capture of members of the gang in their secret cave."

Ned Finley Begins Film Production

Ned Finley, soldier of fortune in many lands, actor and author, long with the Vitagraph, on January 22 departed for Bat Cave, North Carolina, with a company of players to direct the first production of the Ned Finley Films, Incorporated. The company is sponsored by several men associated with banking in this city, is capitalized at $100,000, and will turn out three-reel outdoor pictures, releasing about twelve a year through the General Film.

The first one will be called "The Return of O'Garry," being the further adventures of the Royal Mounted Canadian hero, in which Mr. Finley made such a success, both as actor and director, under J. Stuart Blackton's supervision. Edith Storey was the leading woman in the one that brought the largest measure of success.

The leading woman for the new series is Marian Henry, daughter of Division Chief Henry, of the Secret Service, and the niece of Former Chief Hazen. Incidentally, she is the wife of Mr. Finley.

Irwin Maps Out Empey Campaign

Walter W. Irwin, general manager of the Vitagraph distributing organization, was engaged for the better part of last week in laying out plans for the quadruple advertising campaign that is to signalize the release of "Over the Top," the film reproduction of Sergeant Arthur Guy Empey's war book, in which the sergeant himself is to play the leading role, supported by Lois Meredith.

This campaign, as outlined by Mr. Irwin, will consist of a nation-wide co-operative effort by Vitagraph, G. P. Putnam's Sons, publishers of the book; Lee Keedick, lecture manager for Empey, and the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, which is syndicating Empey's book.

Fox Gets New Contracts on Special

Exhibitors are evincing keen interest in William Fox's forthcoming "Jack Spurlock-Prodigal," with George Walsh as star, according to announcement from the Fox offices, and many new patrons have been obtained for the William Fox Special Features to whom this picture is to go without extra charge. This, however, applies only to exhibitors listed January 30 as having contracted for Fox Special Features.

The Fox offices announced this week that Walsh has been confined to the hospital for a week, and is likely to be "out of commission for two additional weeks," as the result of a fall which broke three ribs and gave the star a scalp wound. The accident followed closely on the completion of the picture.

Specialists Called In

"The Light Within," the second production in which Madame Olga Petrova is shortly to appear, necessitated the expert services of two New York laboratory specialists during the taking of several scenes, Petrova Pictures announced this week.

Jester Comedies Gaining Ground

In the opinion of the Jester Comedy Co. the rapidity with which the Jester Comedies are being taken up by exchange men throughout the country testifies to the good judgment displayed by William Steiner in securing Twede-Dan as the featured comedian.

Mr. Steiner, who is now on tour throughout the country, reports that at all showings given Twede-Dan was proclaimed as a comedian of exceptional ability, owing to the fact that he does not follow a beaten path by assuming one style of make-up.

In "The Recruit," the first of the Jester two-reel super comedies, to be released on February 15, Twede-Dan makes his debut before American audiences. Immediately upon the finishing of "The Recruit" work was started on "His Golden Romance," a story entirely opposite from "The Recruit." Work is almost completed on "All 'Fur' Her," the third release, to be followed by "In and Out."

Coal Shortage Stops Select Film

The recent "closing order" from Washington caught Clara Kimball Young's studio forces unawares, according to an announcement from Select Pictures, and "The House of Glass" was temporarily held up.

Work was rushed on the remaining scenes in the hope that the picture could be finished before the ruling was enforced, but, despite every effort, about two days' work remained to be done when Friday morning dawned. In consequence Miss Young was forced to carry her staff of players and studio helpers over the five-day halt in activities, and the completion of "The House of Glass" was not reached until the end of last week.

Pantages Picks "Hidden Hand" Serial

Reports from Los Angeles indicate great activity in Pathe's office there. Alexander Pantages, before booking "The Hidden Hand," viewed another serial and, after looking at one episode, instructed the operator to quit, as he claimed it was simply a continuation of a preceding one and that the public would not like to see these characters on the screen for another fifteen weeks.

"Les Miserables" played at Clune's Auditorium for a full week.

Pathe News is playing at Clune's Auditorium, Clune's Broadway, Tally's theatre, Orpheum theatre, Miller's theatre, as well as the new million-dollar theatre.

Brenon Connects War and Film

Thinks Conflict May Cripple the Industry, But Sees No Financial Ruin Ahead—Will Help the Government

HERBERT BRENON, in an interview last week concerning the war in its relation to the motion picture, voiced his opinion that the country has not yet grasped the grim seriousness of the war into which we have lately entered.

"I am not a calamity howler," said Mr. Brenon, "and I am not one of those who believe that the war is going to send the motion picture industry to the dogs. The motion picture has come to stay. It has already taken its place among the foremost industries of the world. But that the war is going to cripple the industry, I haven't a doubt. Not because of the war tax; not because of increased admission prices, or the salaries of stars, and the hundred and one comparatively insignificant reasons that are being continually set forth, but because the Government needs men. When I say men, I do not necessarily mean brawn. In this particular instance I mean brains.

"The Government is going to call upon the brains of industry to help win the war. In a year or two there won't be an able man to be found in this country who is not devoting his energies, his skill, and his entire time to doing his bit for his country.

"The motion picture industry will do its share. It has a vast supply of resources which even now the Government is calling for. Do you think our young men are going to refuse to answer?

"When the Government calls for mechanics where will better ones be found than in the studios? Electricians, camera men, still photographers, scenic artists for camouflage, telephone operators and stenographers, all will respond to their country's call and the industry will be crippled.

"You can't ruin an industry like ours. It is destined to take an important place in the world's work. Now is the time to prove what it can do.

"The motion picture is going to be one of the vital factors in the winning of this war. It's going to be a strong factor in bringing the various countries closer together, to express their real aims and accomplishments, and to spread propaganda. The screen tells the truth. The written word has little value compared to seeing with one's own eye."

Quebec City Theatres Open Sunday

By a decision returned January 12 in the court of King's Bench sitting in appeals, all moving picture theatres in Quebec City may open on Sunday. This decision revokes a series of judgments delivered in the recorder's court, superior court and the court of revision. For the last few years the local theatres had been forced to close their doors on Sunday by a municipal by-law which had been sustained by the recorder's court and superior court. The next day after the decision was announced being Sunday, January 13, several local exhibitors took advantage of the victory to open their theatres.

Rita Jolivet, Lusitania Survivor, Is Presented by Metro in "Lest We Forget," Woven About the Ship's Sinking

"Lest We Forget" Opens at the Lyric

"LEST WE FORGET," completed but a few days ago by Metro Pictures Corporation, which announced it as a timely spectacle, opened for a brief run at the Lyric theatre in New York on January 28. Rita Jolivet is star of the feature, the story of which concerns international war events.

Metro, in an announcement this week, lays particular stress upon the excellence of the cast supporting Miss Jolivet in the picture. Hamilton Revelle appears opposite the star in the role of Harry Winslow. He is already known to Metro audiences, having been starred in "The Price of Malice," "An Enemy to Society" and "The Half-Million Bribe."

L. Rogers Lytton, well-known screen player, is seen as Baron van Bergen, a German master spy. This is a role similar to the one he played in "The Battle Cry of Peace."

Kate Blancke plays Madame Heriot, the mother of Rita, who is portrayed by Rita Jolivet. Miss Blancke is a Metro favorite who has been seen in "The Brand of Cowardice," "The End of the Tour" and other productions.

Clifford Saum, who plays Fritz Muller, also assisted in the direction of this picture. Saum is well known as an assistant director, having worked with J. Gordon Edwards in the production of pictures starring Theda Bara and other stars.

Emil Roe, who is seen as the mayor of Rose-sur-Meuse, is well known on the West Coast, where he was a member of the Balboa and other motion picture stock companies. Henry Smith, a veteran player of the stage, is seen as General Joffre. Gaby Perrier plays a young mother role. Other members of the cast are Texas Cooper, H. P. St. Leger, Ernest Mautain, Edward Gerstle and George Slatteau. Extras were used in the ensemble scenes.

Dixon Confers with Mastercraft Heads

THOMAS DIXON, JR., spent several days in New York last week conferring with the directors of the newly formed Mastercraft Photo-Play Corporation in reference to producing his literary works upon the screen.

In a statement to Motion Picture News Mr. Dixon said: "I attribute a great deal of the success of 'The Birth of a Nation' to the fact that Mr. Griffiffith and myself went over the script many, many times in a careful, painstaking manner and we visualized in our own minds before the actual work of filming, just what the result would be upon the screen. Up to the present time producers have not favored this method of working but seemed to prefer to purchase a story from the author and then turn it over to their scenario department and directors to make as they think best. A great many times these men have not the sympathy or the same viewpoint as the author has and thus a great many pictures are failures where it would have been possible to have made them highly successful. It is the intention of the Mastercraft Photo-Play Corporation to work with the author, the same as Mr. Griffith and I worked with 'The Birth of a Nation,' and this is the chief reason why I am becoming affiliated with this newly formed organization."

Jack Dillon Directs Myrtle Lind

Director Jack Dillon is said to be making good time on his latest Triangle subject, "Betty Comes Home," a five-reel comedy-drama, in which Myrtle Lind, former Triangle-Keystone player, has the title role. With good luck he expects to have this picture in the film editing department within another week. Jack Gilbert is supporting Miss Lind in this picture and this well-known juvenile, who recently rejoined the Triangle forces, is seen as the son of a rich man seeking to make his way in the world as a chauffeur, just to prove to his stern parent that he is of some use after all.

The cast also includes Myrtle Rishell, a newcomer at the Culver City studios, Gene Burr, George Pearce, Anna Dodge, Percy Challenger and J. P. Wilde.

Lincoln Leaves New York for Coast

E. K. Lincoln left New York for Hollywood, Cal., January 25, where he will be featured in a seven-reel feature under the direction of W. Christy Cabanne. This film production will introduce Mr. Cabanne as author and producer, as well as director. Since appearing as star in the Mutual-Jimmy Dale serial, "The Grey Seal," Mr. Lincoln has been starred in "The Freedom of the World," produced by Ira M. Lowry and released by Goldwyn. He has also just completed a Goldwyn regular feature, in which he played opposite Mae Marsh, in "The Beloved Traitor."

Judge Brown Adds Three Stories

Three new subjects have been announced for the Judge Brown Stories being distributed by General Film Co. "Tad's Swimming Hole," the first, is a story of boy life, and is said to have plenty of lively humor in it. Following this release comes "Marrying Off Dad." "The Preacher's Son," which had been scheduled for earlier release, is the sixth release in the series of two-reel stories of youth written by Judge Willis Brown.

"Guilty Man" Teaches a Moral

Emerson and Loos Write Stone Subjects

Prior to commencing activities on the John Emerson-Anita Loos Productions, to be released by Paramount, this duo is now engaged on a number of scenarios for Paramount stars. Fred Stone's initial motion picture vehicle has just been completed by Mr. Emerson and Miss Loos. This story, not as yet titled, will present the stage star as he first appeared in professional life, namely, a circus performer. The picture will offer a melodramatic farce introducing Mr. Stone to the screen.

It is announced by Paramount that Donald Crisp, who recently signed a long term contract with the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, will direct the initial Stone film. Work on the John Emerson-Anita Loos Productions for Paramount will be started on May 1.

Child and Dog Featured by General

In "Compliments of the Season," which General Film has announced as the current Broadway Star Feature, a child and a dog have the principal parts. Aida Horton is the child player, and the canine is called "Flip." Others in the cast are Herbert Pryor and Betty Blythe. The picture is from an O. Henry story of the same name as that under which the film is released.

"The Moment of Victory," a story of Spanish-American war days, in which Chet Ryan, W. L. Rodgers, and Patricia Palmer have the leading roles, is announced as the next O. Henry released through General Film.

Foursquare Cites Exhibitor Testimonial

Foursquare Pictures, Inc., this week cited the following as one of the many testimonials received by the company's various exchanges. This one was sent by Exhibitor Filizola of the Theaterette at Fort Scott, Kansas, and was received by the Kansas City Foursquare Exchange, in charge of Sidney J. Baker: "Please find my check to pay for your feature, 'One Hour,' and I also want to tell you that every one who saw it had nothing but praise for it, and I say myself it certainly is a perfect picture."

Goldwyn Experiences No Delay

Company's Activities Were Several Days Ahead of Conservation Order—Three Features Completed and On Their Way

IN an announcement concerning conditions brought about by Fuel Administrator Garfield's recent order to save coal by declaring a five-day holiday, Goldwyn Pictures Corporation claims that it found itself in a very fortunate condition. The company insists that for weeks its officials have strained every resource to meet any action that might be taken by the Government's representatives.

"Therefore," explains the report from Goldwyn, "when Director Garfield's closing order came, with a five-day enforced closing of studios and film printing laboratories, Goldwyn at once took stock of its state of preparedness and found that its next three productions were completed and in transit to its branches. This means that Goldwyn exhibitors will suffer no delays that can be attributed to the home offices and producing plants of the Goldwyn organization and that the branches of the company throughout North America have their product in hand for the exhibitor customers in the various zones.

"The wisdom of working at top speed for months in the Goldwyn studios now finds complete justification in the position of the company. The releases ahead that are already out are: Mabel Normand in 'Dodging a Million,' released January 27; Madge Kennedy in 'Our Little Wife,' released February 10; Mae Marsh in 'The Beloved Traitor,' released February 24.

"Goldwyn also has at least four more completed productions in addition to these named which can be released in any order that the company sees fit to issue them. During November and December much comment was created in the industry by the Goldwyn decision to work at the full capacity of its plant during months when, because of weather conditions in the East, companies usually seek to reduce operation wherever possible.

Anna Q. Nilsson, in "Heart of the Sunset," Released by Goldwyn

"Two weeks ago Goldwyn rented and began work in an additional studio on Manhattan Island, and now has companies at work in this building in 125th street, near Lexington avenue, as well as in the Goldwyn plant in Fort Lee. Additional production plans give every Goldwyn exhibitor the assurance that Goldwyn will keep far in advance of the national emergency so that its exhibitor customers will be enabled to do 'business as usual' with Goldwyn Pictures."

Paramount Announces Louise Huff Era

LOUISE HUFF, it was announced last week by Paramount, has been exceptionally busy at the West Coast studios, where Paramount pictures are produced, and will be presented during the coming three months in frequent releases, which include two productions as co-star with Jack Pickford, these being "His Majesty, Bunker Bean" and "Mile-a-Minute Kendall," and also the first of the J. Stuart Blackton productions to be filmed in the West, "Wild Youth," from the pen of Sir Gilbert Parker.

Since her appearance with Jack Pickford in "Jack and Jill," in which Miss Huff appeared as the New York flower-girl sweetheart of the pugilistically inclined Jack, the Paramount actress is not seen with Jack Pickford in his latest three pictures, the two productions of "Tom Sawyer" and "The Spirit of '17." Miss Huff, however, will come back as co-star with Jack in "His Majesty, Bunker Bean," the picture which has been filmed from the stage play. Miss Huff plays the role of "The Flapper."

"The dainty star should win fresh laurels in the next of the Pickford-Huff releases which is to follow 'His Majesty, Bunker Bean,' that of 'Mile-a-Minute-Kendall,'" said Paramount last week. "In 'Wild Youth,' the Blackton production which is now being filmed under the direction of George Melford, Miss Huff plays one of the three leading roles. According to Commodore Blackton, whose productions are characterized by a selection of characters which absolutely correspond to those of the novelist's creations, no better selection for the girl of the story could have been made than that of Louise Huff, who plays the young wife, Louise Mazarine."

With what is declared to be an exceptionally strong cast, including Bertha Mann, Rhea Mitchell, Charles Clary, Bertram Grassby, Marc Robbins, Willard Louis and Edward M. Wallace, Director Frank Lloyd of the William Fox staff, is working at Hollywood, Cal., on a production which has for its object the disclosing of evils of the divorce system.

It is tentatively scheduled for release March 10 as a Standard Picture.

Red-Blooded Action Is Promised in "The Sign Invisible," Released Through the First National Exhibitors' Association

"Sign Invisible" Release in February

EDGAR LEWIS' latest production, "The Sign Invisible," recently acquired by the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, is to be released February 18, it was announced this week. The feature is from an original script by Anthony P. Kelly, First National announces.

Regarding the picture further, First National said:—"It is a picture of similar calibre to Mr. Lewis' 'The Barrier' and 'The Bar Sinister,' and numbers among its cast several of the players whose work was so much appreciated in them. Mitchell Lewis was Polcon in 'The Barrier' and is Lone Deer in 'The Sign Invisible.' As a giant half breed hunter, who is equally ready for a lark or a fight and who is as popular with the Episcopal Bishop and his daughter as with the men of the trading post, Mr. Lewis has a role which displays both his good nature and manly strength of character to splendid advantage. Victor Sutherland has the part of Dr. Robert Winston, a God fearing man and eminent surgeon, who loses faith in Providence because his scientifically correct operations prove fatal to five successive patients—and, worst of all—his own mother, who despite his protests insists that he and no other shall perform a capital operation upon her. Following her death he seeks forgetfulness in dissipation and is eventually persuaded by his friends to seek regeneration in the Canadian Northwest, where the principal action of the story takes place. The other leading characters are Lou Baribeau (Edward F. Roseman), the bad factor of the Big Co.; Monihan (Phil Sanford), the toughest river boss that ever hit the North; Rev. Rene Mercier (Wm. A. Williams), the village clergyman; Jeanette (Mabel Juline Scott), his daughter, and Winona (Hedda Nova), an Indian maiden, who is Lone Deer's sweetheart.

Quaint Characters Appear in "Prunella"

"THE cast in 'Prunella,' Marguerite Clark's next subject for the Paramount program," said an announcement from Famous Players-Lasky this week, "includes quaint and interesting types of days gone by.

"Miss Clark plays the title role of Prunella, the unfortunate child of an elopement, who, after the death of her mother was reared from infancy by her three spinster aunts, Prude, Prim and Privacy, characterized in the photoplay by Isabel Berwin, Nora Cecil and Marcia Harris.

"Jules Raucourt, who has just completed his work in 'La Tosca' with Pauline Frederick as Mario, plays the part of Pierrot, the impetuous lover who takes Prunella from the home where she has been brought up to young womanhood as innocent of worldly things as a child, and after a few years of married life deserts her. He finds that he cannot live without her, however, and comes back to the broken-hearted girl, humble and penitent.

"Harry Leoni is Pierrot's servant, and the gardeners for the aunts at various times are William J. Cross, A. Voorhes Wood and Charles Hartley, and Arthur Kennedy is the gardener's boy.

"The extreme innocence of Prunella and the efforts of her aunts to withhold from her all knowledge of affairs of the world leads to many humorous situations, in marked contrast to the later incidents in which Prunella excites much sympathy. Maurice Tourneur, who has won commendation for his direction of 'Rose of the World,' an Artcraft picture starring Elsie Ferguson, and who has finished the production of 'The Blue Bird' for Artcraft, is directing Miss Clark in Prunella, and Charles Maigne, who adapted 'The Blue Bird' for the screen wrote the scenario for this latest production."

Nineteen Directors on Fox Payroll

The recent addition of Edmund Lawrence to the staff of directors of the Fox Film Corporation brings the total number now in the employ of William Fox to nineteen. Two others, Edward J. Le Saint and Oscar A. C. Lund, have recently joined the Fox forces. Mr. Lawrence is directing Virginia Pearson in a new war play, Mr. Le Saint is working on the Pacific Coast, and Mr. Lund at present is in New Orleans taking scenes for Peggy Hyland's first Fox picture.

The others include J. Gordon Edwards, now in California; R. A. Walsh, Frank Lloyd, who has just completed a picture dealing with the divorce problem; Carl Harbaugh, Richard Stanton, C. M. and S. A. Franklin, Harry Millarde, Kenean Buel, Bertram Bracken and Henry Lehrman. Five directors are working under Mr. Lehrman's supervision on Sunshine Comedies. Those on the Pacific Coast, besides Mr. Edwards, are Mr. Lloyd, the Franklins, Mr. Lehrman, Mr. Le Saint and Mr. Bracken.

Vitagraph Helps Red Cross on Coast

From California this week Vitagraph sent an announcement to the effect that the Red Cross profited by several hundred dollars recently as the result of a scene made at the Western sutdio for "The Woman in the Web," the serial in which Hedda Nova, the Russian actress, and J. Frank Glendon are to be starred. Some of the most prominent Los Angeles and Pasadena society women, numbering among them members of the winter colony, appeared as "extras" in the White House ball room scene and paid for the privilege of appearing in the picture, the money thus paid being turned over to the Red Cross.

Hyland in the South

Peggy Hyland is in New Orleans, where she has begun work on her first picture for William Fox. O. A. C. Lund will direct the picture.

Goodrich Feature Scheduled February 4

EDNA GOODRICH, in an emotional play of "Bohemian" artistic life in Greenwich Village, the "Latin Quarter" of New York, is announced by Mutual for release February 4, under the title of "Who Loved Him Best?" The production was made under the direction of Dell Henderson, and is the sixth Goodrich picture made for Mutual.

Miss Goodrich is cast as Doria Dane, a brilliant star of filmdom, who sacrifices her career to be near the man she loves, a sculptor of genius discouraged by his inability to produce. Posing for the artist, her beauty inspires him to create a masterpiece, but success goes to his head and he neglects her for a woman of fashion. He is brought to a realization of her unselfish love when, after breaking into fragments, as he believes, his masterpiece, she confesses she has saved the original and destroyed a copy, made by a jealous fellow artist.

The situations developed in the "Bohemian" environment are said to afford Miss Goodrich scope for intensive emotional acting surpassing anything she has done since joining the film forces.

Scenes taken in a motion picture studio during the actual production and "shooting" of scenes, give glimpses of "backstage" in film plants. A gorgeous "Saturnalia" of the artists of Greenwich Village, which corresponds to the "Beaux-Art" ball of the Latin Quarter of Paris, is a remarkably spectacular presentation of the irrepressible and irresponsible artists at play.

DeMille-Wyckoff Add to Color Process

ALTHOUGH no disclosures are made as to the processes which are in use to employ the use of colors in productions, Cecil B. DeMille, director-general of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, and Alvin Wyckoff, director of photography, are willing to admit, according to an announcement this week, that rapid strides have been accomplished in the employment of their new inventions, examples of the use of which are to be seen in current De Mille-Artcraft productions. Further use of the newly invented color process is to be made, according to a statement by Mr. DeMille.

As explained by Mr. DeMille and Mr. Wyckoff, who have been working together for several years to perfect the invention, this process does not give glaring and noticeable colors to the films, but softens and subdues the coloring of scenes to an almost pastel effect. The process, by the way, noticed particularly in certain scenes in "The Woman God Forgot" and "The Devil Stone," by no means necessitates hand coloring of certain scenes in which colors are used.

The flames surrounding Geraldine Farrar in "Joan the Woman," the light of the sacrificial altars in the Aztec spectacle, the weird coloring of the remarkable and sinister jewel which gives the title to "The Devil Stone"—these are all accomplished by the new invention.

"We have been working slowly and cautiously on this process for the past two years," said Mr. DeMille, "and have studied color photography in all its branches. We have come to the conclusion that color photography, in the sense of absolutely faithful reproduction of natural colors, or any method of coloring where the tints used are of the glaring variety, can never be used universally in motion pictures, for the eye of the spectator would be put to too great a strain, and the variety of the colors would distract the attention from the story values."

"Sixth Sense Helped 'Mickey'"—Sennett

IN speaking last week of the production "Mickey," which the Western Import Co. is distributing with Mabel Normand as the star, Mack Sennett, the producer of the picture, said:

"What success I have attained is due to the fact that my whole heart went into the work. You can teach an actor to go through his part—you can teach a director the technique of the trade, but you can't teach either of them to know an interesting picture situation at sight. It is a queer sixth sense.

"In the production of 'Mickey' I was personally on the job seven days a week. I superintended the planning of every scene and situation. I went over every bit of detail with my assistants. I made the final assembling of this production myself, and I can now honestly say to myself, 'Well done, Mack Sennett.' I don't want to be put in the light of throwing bouquets at myself, but I feel that I can honestly say that 'Mickey' is a masterpiece.

"However, the credit is not only due to myself, but to the fine co-operation of Miss Normand, her supporting cast, my assistants and my camera men. I have a great deal of faith in the old stage saying: 'What you cut will never bore anybody.' For every foot of 'Mickey' that is shown on the screen thirty feet have been destroyed. This was deliberate on our part. My idea is to serve nothing but the kernel of the nut. Film fans are tired of vampires, tired of moving picture cannon and charging soldiers. It is too much like war, and there is too much real sorrow in the world just now to need any heart pangs that are made to order. 'Mickey' will be as refreshing as a breeze from the mountains on a hot summer day."

Jackie Saunders Here; Leaves Balboa

Miss Jackie Saunders, long associated with Balboa, at Long Beach, Cal., and now in New York, this week announced that she had severed connections with that company and that she was now considering plans for the future.

Miss Saunders first attracted attention as an artist's model for magazine illustrators, and because of her adaptability she was persuaded to try a screen career and became connected with Biograph. After that she was with Pathe, Universal and Balboa. In pictures for the latter company she has been featured on the programs of Pathe and more recently, Mutual. In addition to her work before the camera she has written many of the scenarios in which she has appeared.

Her reasons for seeking new connections are that she wants a wider field for her talents, and is anxious to appear in strong stories that will afford opportunity for more than the exhibition of her personal charms. She takes her work with great seriousness and is just as ambitious as a girl starting on her career. She is at the Astor and expects to announce her plans within a few days.

Lamothe Returns from New Orleans

Julian Louis Lamothe, Paralta staff author, returned from New Orleans last week, where he had been spending his holiday vacation. Due to the building, changing and bustle at the studios, he was compelled to spend most of the day of his arrival chasing up his office furniture, which had disappeared in his absence. When he has righted things a little he will begin work on a story he is preparing.

Mr. Lamothe wrote the screen version of "His Robe of Honor" and "Humdrum Brown," both Henry B. Walthall plays, and several other screen versions while with Paralta.

Advance Offerings of the Programs

"Limousine Life" in February

New Olive Thomas Feature Released Week of 3d, Along With "The Hopper" and a Keystone Comedy Production

TRIANGLE DISTRIBUTING CORPORATION this week announced its schedule of releases for the week of February 3, when Olive Thomas' newest subject, "Limousine Life," will lead off the list in what Triangle expects to be an auspicious manner. Other pictures slated for the same week are "The Hopper," with William V. Mong in the title role, and a Keystone comedy, as well as a Triangle laugh-maker.

"Limousine Life" is an adaptation of the story by the same title. A fashion exhibit is said to be a feature of the picture, with gowns displayed by attractive models. The story relates how the belle of an Iowa village slipped away to Chicago with the assistance of her sweetheart and secured a position in a modiste's shop.

Lee Phelps, a recent addition to the Triangle forces, has a prominent role, and others in the cast of "Limousine Life" are Joe Bennett, Lillian West, Lottie DuVaulle, Harry Rattenberry, Alberta Lee, Jules Friquet and Lillian Langdon. Jack Dillon directed the feature.

The crook comedy, "The Hopper," adapted by Jack Cunningham from Meredith Nicholson's story, is the second release of the week. It is said to be a unique, up-to-date and distinctly "live" story.

William V. Mong, in the title role, has opportunity for what is said to be unusual character work. Peaches Jackson, child player, who appeared in "The Maternal Spark," is also cast. George Hernandez and Walt Whitman, both veterans of the Triangle screen, give characterizations of rival curio collectors. Other members of the cast are Irene Hunt, Lillian West, Thomas Kurihara, Eugene Cory and Louis Durham. "The Hopper" was directed by Thomas N. Heffron.

Plots, powder and petticoats on board ship combine to produce laughter in the Keystone Comedy, "A Sea Serpent's Desire," also released this week.

"Airing Their Troubles" and "A Safe Disaster" are Triangle Komedies scheduled for the week of the 3d.

Eltinge and Ray New Features Released

JULIAN ELTINGE in "The Widow's Might" and Charles Ray in the Thomas H. Ince production, "The Hired Man," wound up the Paramount release schedule for January. Both these subjects were released on January 28 when, it was felt by Paramount, a double triumph would be achieved in view of the advance reports on the two productions.

The Julian Eltinge picture was staged several months ago by William C. DeMille at the Famous Players-Lasky Studios in Hollywood. Written especially for the female impersonator by Marion Fairfax and produced under the direction of William C. DeMille, "The Widow's Might" is said to offer the star his best vehicle since becoming affiliated with the motion picture studio. The story concerns a young New Yorker who decides to dabble in ranching and narrowly misses being robbed by a notorious crook. How he succeeds in foiling the designs of this individual through the disguise of a woman, how the disguise gets him into lots of trouble with the girl he loves and finally how he at length wins out and saves both the girl and the ranch is expected to prove a series of swiftly moving incidents that will more than hold interest throughout. Supporting Mr. Eltinge is a cast including Florence Vidor, Gustave Von Seyffertitz, Mayme Kelso, James Neill, Larry Steers and George McKenzie.

"The Hired Hand," Charles Ray's new subject, produced by Victor L. Schertzinger under the personal supervision of Thomas H. Ince, presents the star in a typical "down East" character. As Ezry Hollins, Ray portrays the youthful farm hand, whose ambitious aspirations lead him into various difficulties. In the cast are Charles French, Gilbert Gordon, Lydia Knott, Doris Lee and Carl.

"Wild Women" Stars Harry Carey

"Wild Women," it was announced last week by Universal, is the culmination of a series of special features in which Harry Carey has been starred under the direction of Jack Ford. The story was written by George Hively, although both Harry Carey and Jack Ford collaborated. The comedy-drama has a Western and Hawaiian setting.

Molly Malone, Vesta Pegg, Martha Mattox, Wilfred Taylor, Ed Jones and the Universal cowboys support Harry Carey in "Wild Women."

Pauline Frederick, Among Paramount's Most Magnetic Stars

"Madame Jealousy" Soon

The next Pauline Frederick vehicle following "Mrs. Dane's Defense" to be released by Paramount is "Madame Jealousy," the George V. Hobart story staged recently under the direction of Robert Vignola, the scenario for which was written by Eve Unsell.

Miss Frederick is now engaged in the production of "La Tosca" at the Famous Players-Lasky studio in New York.

Mozukin in February 17 Pathe

Ivan Mozukin, the Russian star, will make his next appearance in the Pathe release of February 17. The feature is entitled "The Inner Voice."

"Moral Law" in February

One of the William Fox February releases is announced as "The Moral Law," starring Gladys Brockwell. In this picture the star has a dual role, of two sisters.

Fuel Order Changes Pathe Releases

Owing to the changed conditions due to the factory closing order of the Fuel Administration, Pathe announces a change in dates of release of the one-reel Harold Lloyd comedies.

"The Lamb" will be released February 3, as announced, but on February 10 a one-reel comedy will be issued, in which Harry Pollard and Bebe Daniels are the stars, under the title of "Hello, Teacher."

Beginning with February 17 the Lloyd comedies will be released weekly, the first to be "Hit Him Again," on that date, and followed on February 24 with "Beat It," and on March 3 with "A Gasoline Wedding."

"Eve's Daughter" Gets Early Release

"Eve's Daughter," it was announced this week by Famous Players-Lasky, has been completed, with Billie Burke as the star, and will be released shortly on the Paramount program. The subject is described as a comedy drama, written by Alicia Ramsey. As a legitimate production it served Grace George.

Miss Burke's next production, it is announced, will be in a high comedy vein and will be directed by Joseph Kaufman, who recently completed "The Song of Songs," starring Elsie Ferguson.

The supporting roles in "Eve's Daughter" are played by Thomas Meighan, Lionel Atwill, Wm. Riley Hatch, Florence Flynn, Harriet Ross, Lucile Carney, Mary Navaro and Harry Lee.

"Super Strategy" Release Date Set

The date of release of the ten-reel feature film, "Super Strategy," which has covered a production period of six months, is now announced for April 7. The first prints were shipped from the Hollywood Studios January 26 to the New York offices of the Mena Film Company, and the advertising campaign will be begun February 15, under the direction of Robert Hollister. No announcement has been made as yet by the Mena Company as to their method of distribution.

Rupert Julian Directs Universal Special

After a service as a director of Bluebird features of approximately two consecutive years, Rupert Julian has terminated his association with that program and will turn his attention to the production, at Universal City, of a super-feature that will run into number of reels still to be determined. The nature of the story, which Mr. Julian will also write, has not been divulged, but it is declared that a world problem will be dealt with, encompassing a modern conception of international political life.

Mr. Julian has lately been directing Monroe Salisbury and Ruth Clifford in furnishing Bluebird attractions.

Margarita Fischer, Whom America Numbers Among Its Most Attractive Stars, Is Presented by Mutual In "Jilted Janet"

Mutual Chooses February List

Stars Included Are Edna Goodrich, Margarita Fischer, Ann Murdock and William Russell—Other Stars in March

MUTUAL'S schedule of February feature releases includes productions starring Edna Goodrich, Margarita Fischer, Ann Murdock and William Russell, while March will bring pictures starring Mary Miles Minter, Olive Tell, Miss Murdock, Mr. Russell and Miss Fischer.

The schedule for late January and February is: January 21, William Russell in "In Bad"; January 28, Mary Miles Minter in "Beauty and the Rogue"; February 4, Edna Goodrich in "Who Loved Him Best?" February 11, Margarita Fischer in "Jilted Janet"; February 18, Ann Murdock in "My Wife," and February 25, William Russell in "Detective Dan Cupid."

"Jilted Janet" has been pronounced by Mutual one of Margarita Fischer's most entertaining pictures. It deals with the adventure of a dare-devil miss who stole the mansion next door to entertain the lover who jilted her and his bride, the unexpected arrival of the young master of the house and the girl's frantic efforts to get rid of her company and avert exposure.

"My Wife" is one of the Charles Frohman plays in pictures, produced for Mutual by the Empire All Star Corporation. It is described as a clever adaptation of a clever play and casts Miss Murdock in the role of a young English girl who marries for convenience to comply with the terms of an eccentric aunt's will, finds herself in love with her husband, despite her betrothal to a soldier in France. It is a role said to be admirably suited to Miss Murdock. She is supported by a cast of Frohman players.

The forthcoming William Russell production was produced under the working title of "Detective Dan Cupid" and gives the screen actor the role of a romantic Sherlock Holmes. It provides Mr. Russell, Mutual declares, plenty of opportunity to develop the particular quality of humor which has marked his most recent motion picture productions.

"Extra! Extra!" is a newspaper story, and Miss Minter plays the role of a young heiress, who comes into possession of a newspaper.

Second Toto Comedy on February 17

Pathe announces a slight change in the release dates of the new Toto comedies. "The Junk Man" is postponed from February 10 to February 17. From February 17 on there will be one of these two-reel comedies released each week. "Fare, Please," will be released on March 17 and "A One Night Stand" on April 14.

From reports received on "The Movie Dummy," the first of the Toto comedies to be issued, it is apparent, Pathe says, that the new screen star has "caught on" from the start. The first week's showings everywhere have been most successful, according to Pathe.

Paralta Play Presented

On Monday and Wednesday (Tuesday being dark) of the week of January 28 the Paralta Play, "His Robe of Honor," starring Henry B. Walthall, was the attraction at the Eighty-first Street theatre in New York.

This theatre on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday of the same week presented "Daughter of Destiny," in which Madame Olga Petrova stars.

"Cinderella Man" Runs Well

Goldwyn Hails It As Record Breaker and One of Best Made by That Company—Three Weeks in Los Angeles House

THAT the production of "The Cinderella Man," starring Mae Marsh, with Tom Moore in support, is establishing a record throughout the country is claimed by Goldwyn Pictures Corporation this week in an announcement, which cites the result as "what happens when a picture producer makes a feature that is nearly flawless concerning star, story and director."

"This production," said Goldwyn, "which was released December 16, has just completed a run of twenty-one consecutive days at J. A. Quinn's Rialto theatre, Los Angeles, where the patronage and high receipts of the third week strongly tempted Mr. Quinn to continue the presentation for a fourth week. This was made impossible, however, because of his previously made contracts.

"As indicating the box-office power and public popularity of Goldwyn productions, it may be pointed out that 'The Cinderella Man' is by no means the first Goldwyn production to enjoy a lengthened run at Quinn's Rialto. 'Polly of the Circus' was played for two consecutive weeks; 'Baby Mine' for two; 'The Spreading Dawn' for two; 'The Auction Block' for two. And now, to top this, 'The Cinderella Man' plays for three weeks, establishing what is undoubtedly a record for length of booking for a regularly scheduled release of a producing company.

"Another production distributed by Goldwyn, though not produced by the company, which is sweeping the country and proving a profit-maker for exhibitors, is 'For the Freedom of the World,' written by Captain Edwin Bower Hesser. The Goldwyn offices say that eighty-five per cent of the theatres that have booked and played this feature to date either already played repeat dates or booked the production for repeat dates later on."

Victor Moore New Comedy Makes Debut

KLEVER PICTURES, INC., released on January 28 the Klever Komedy called "He Got His," with Victor Moore in the chief comedy role, supported by a convincing cast.

The story tells that Vic is a broker, one of the kind that wil stick to you until your last dollar, but it has got to be your dollar. A Mrs. Carver calls upon him to arrange to invest some money in stocks, and does not want to let her husband, who is a doctor, know anything about it. Vic, of course, nails the money, and she invites him up to tea, hoping to interest her husband. He calls and meets the doctor. He tells the Doc he has a fine "tip" and offers to let him in on it if he will be at his office early the next morning. The Doc falls for it like a busted Zeppelin, and promises to meet Vic. The next morning just as the Doc is about to depart for Vic's office he gets a phone call to come to the hospital at once. On arrival there he is informed that a patient is coming and must be operated on immediately. He tells the nurse to prepare the patient as soon as he arrives, as he will be right back, and he makes for Vic's office. He is now twenty minutes late and on arrival there he finds the office empty. Presently the office boy arrives and tells the Doc he heard Vic phone the Doc's wife and probably he has gone there. The Doc gets as suspicious as a dog in a sausage factory and makes a hasty departure for his home. Vic in the meantime, owing to Doc being late, figured he was held up at the hospital and rushes there. Entering the hospital he asks for Doc Carver, and the nurses and attendants thinking he is the patient due rush him up to the operating room. Before he can explain himself Vic is on the operating table, and after a tussle manages to release himself, knocking all the attendants over, and jumps out the window on to a passing wagon and away.

From this point the story continues to what Klever Pictures has characterized as a rousing finish.

Clara Kimball Young Buys "Reason Why"

CLARA KIMBALL YOUNG, according to an announcement this week from Select Pictures, has secured the motion picture rights to Elinor Glyn's novel, "The Reason Why," and is planning to make it her next Select production.

The story was first published serially in a magazine, and later came out in covers. It deals with the tangled love affairs of an American girl and her English husband, and provides as a setting for the tale it unfolds a sort of romantic background.

The screen adaptation has been made by Mary Murillo.

Production on the new play will be started immediately and follows the star's recently completed adaptation of "The House of Glass," which is now being titled. The latter, Max Marcin's melodrama of New York life, promises to rival in its screen presentation the Broadway showing on the legitimate stage a few seasons ago, which was accredited a huge success.

The picture, which is the fourth of the Star Series which she is making for Select Pictures, is directed by Emile Chautard.

Yakima Exhibitor Has a "Goldwyn Month"

Frederick Marcy's Theatrical Enterprises, of North Yakima, Wash., recently used a page of space in the newspapers of that city to tell the public about "Goldwyn month," so-called because the Empire Theatre, operated by that company, is playing no less than five Goldwyn features within the month.

These included "For the Freedom of the World," a special; "Sunshine Alley," with Mae Marsh; "The Manx-Man," Madge Kennedy in "Nearly Married," and the Rex Beach picture, "The Auction Block."

"German Retreat" Is an Added Feature

Concerning "The Retreat of the Germans at the Battle of Arras," the official British war film, which is proving so successful, the Majestic theatre, Springfield, Ill., operating the Finn & Heyman Amusement Co., writes to Pathe as follows:

"We have been running this picture in connection with our regular vaudeville program as an added feature, and are indeed well pleased with the success we have had. The picture is pleasing our patrons and arousing much favorable comment."

February Brings Vivian Martin Film

Vivian Martin's next starring subject will be a Pallas-Paramount production, "A Petticoat Pilot," which is now being filmed from Gardner Hunting's scenario taken from the book by Joseph C. Lincoln, under the direction of Rollin S. Sturgeon. This film will be released early in February.

Unusual Sincerity of Action and Beauty of Detail Are Promised by William Fox in "A Heart's Revenge," In Which Sonia Markova Is Starred

Fox Gives Exhibitors Choice

For Week of January 27 Producer Lets Showmen Pick Between Two Standard Features—Fuel Shortage the Cause

EXHIBITORS under contract for Fox Special Features had their choice the week of January 27 between two Standard Pictures. This is a direct result of the recent order of the fuel administrator providing for the closing of all industrial establishments during a five-day period.

One of the parts of the William Fox organization affected by the closing order was the film printing plant at Fort Lee, N. J. Due to the preceding coal shortage and inability to operate the plant steadily there had been an accumulation of work which was materially increased by the five-day shut down.

To meet this situation and provide a picture for the week of January 27, the Fox management took "Treasure Island" and "Troublemakers" from the Standard Pictures and placed them on the Special Feature calendar, giving exhibitors their choice. Either production which is desired by those holding Fox Special Features contracts were ready for distribution by the last week of the month.

"Treasure Island" is based on Robert Louis Stevenson's novel of the same name, and is a story of a search for buried treasure. Francis Carpenter and Virginia Lee Corbin are the stars. "Troublemakers" is a comedy-drama featuring Jane and Katherine Lee and shows the "two little imps" engaging in all sorts of pranks at the expense of nearly every one in the quiet country town where the scenes are laid.

The remainder of the previously scheduled Special Features have been pushed along a week, the June Caprice picture, "The Heart of Romance," which was to have been released January 27, is now scheduled for February 3. This picture is completed and if the fuel administrator's order had come a day or two later the prints of it would have been available for release on the date originally scheduled.

"Jack Spurlock—Prodigal," the George Walsh feature, which Mr. Fox has widely advertised as being made especially for Special Features, and which is to be released only to those holding contracts, now will be available, barring future unexpected delays, on February 10, being moved up from February 3.

British Rights Sold to Klever Pictures

KLEVER PICTURES, INC., has entered into an arrangement with J. D. Walker's World's Films, Limited, whereby the latter company has secured the entire exhibition rights for the Victor Moore comedies for Great Britain and Ireland for a term of years. The deal was consummated through J. C. Graham, general foreign representative of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, who has just returned from London.

Klever Komedies are said to be meeting with the same success in other countries as experienced in the United States. They are controlled in Australia by the Feature Films, Limited.

The last Victor Moore comedy to be released by Paramount was "He Got His," January 28, described as a rapid-fire production in which Moore is a broker and becomes entangled with a doctor and his wife. The doctor's jealousy is aroused through a series of laughable mixups, and Vic ends upon an operating table with the doctor delightedly preparing to operate on him, though he knows the object of his wrath has been mistaken for an expected patient and has been strapped down by the zealous attendants and nurses.

Peggy Hyland, Pathe, on February 3

Pathe announces that when "The Other Woman" is released on February 3, Peggy Hyland will be seen in a picture play unique in many salient features. It is said to be a social problem play without any of the objectionable features that usually attach to stories of this character.

"Naulahka" Released as Pathe Play

Pathe this week announced that Astra's eight-reel production of Rudyard Kipling's story of romance and adventure, "The Naulahka," made under the direction of George Fitzmaurice, will be released in the Pathe Plays program.

The titles of two of the first five pictures have been changed and the names of these Pathe Plays are announced as follows:

Fannie Ward in "Innocent"; Frank Keenan in "Loaded Dice"; Antonio Moreno and Doraldina in "The Naulahka"; Bessie Love in "How Could You, Bessie?" and Bryant Washburn in "Twenty-One."

It is claimed that the first five Pathe Plays announced above comprise five of the best box-office attractions ever released in consecutive order by this company.

Billy West as Pugilist, March 1

Billy West, who is turning out comedies for the King-Bee Films Corporation at Hollywood, Calif., is filming a two-reel comedy in which he appears as a champion pugilist, which is to be released March 1.

Billy, for love's sake, knocks out Babe Hardy, who weighs three times as much as he does, and later on fights his way through a gang of yeggs, in Fairbanks fashion.

The title of this picture is to be "A Scrapper."

Bennett Feature Ready for Release

Enid Bennett's initial Paramount picture "The Keys of the Righteous," produced under the supervision of Thomas H. Ince, it is announced, is now ready for release. The production, which was directed by Jerome Storm, has just been completed and Miss Bennett has already commenced activities on her second film with the same director.

Film Specialties

Pathe Introduces "The Horse in Action"

ACCORDING to an announcement this week, Pathe plans to release on February 10 a one-reel picture in color called "The Horse in Action." Pathe believes the subject of more than ordinary importance.

In this connection the company said: "Most persons will remember the several 'analysis of motion' pictures which Pathe has issued in the past, and recall their extraordinary beauty and interest. 'The Horse in Action' shows running and jumping horses as seen by the 'ultra rapid' camera, a Pathe invention. The various scenes are in the nature of a revelation.

"Ordinary motion pictures are, of course, taken with a camera, recording sixteen pictures a second, and are projected at the same speed. With the Pathe ultra rapid camera the pictures are taken at the rate of 120 to the second or even more. These pictures are projected at the ordinary rate with the consequence that animate objects in the film move so slowly that the eye can easily follow every phase of the muscular action.

"The effects to be noticed in the case of the horses in 'The Horse in Action' are extraordinary. In the first place the horses selected for these camera studies were remarkably beautiful animals with sleek shining coats. As they go over the hurdles or gallop along the track, every muscular movement is clearly visible. As they jump they seem to float in the air like thistle-down. Every phase of their actions makes splendid material for the artist and the sculptor. When one sees these pictures he is conscious that he never has seen in art true interpretation of motion. The fine lifelike coloring adds greatly to the beauty of the film."

Peace Problem Looms in Pictographs

What Famous Players-Lasky considers a remarkable and graphic illustration of why peace without annexations or indemnities cannot be looked on with favor by the United States and her allies at this time is scheduled to form part of the 104th release of Paramount-Bray Pictograph.

"Women in the World of Work" shows Susanne Bell as the creator of an entirely new kind of work—the raising of thoroughbred white Persian cats.

Pathe Shows France Aiding Italy

The Hearst-Pathe News No. 8 presented to American audiences scenes of the French armies rushing to the aid of Italy. It is said that Pathe claims this subject as a "beat."

In Hearst-Pathe News No. 6 the tribesmen of Arabia were shown flocking to the British colors.

James Montgomery Flagg, the Artist, Sketches His Model, Mary Arthur, in Edison's "The Artist's Model," in the Flagg Series of Satires

Essanay Scenic Stars Virginia Valli

"A Romance of Rails and Power," the current release in the Essanay scenic series, furnishes a striking screen novelty, according to General Film Company. The Essanay star, Virginia Valli, takes part in the scenic, appearing in a story woven around the progress accomplished in electrifying the Eastern railroads.

There is a slight change in these General Film scenic releases, "Water Powers of Eastern Canada" being the release formerly listed as "The Bay of Fundy." After "A Romance of Rails and Power" will come "The Two Greatest Things in the World—The Grand Canyon of Arizona and Canyon de Chelly."

Hayakawa New Subject Is Named

The title of Sessue Hayakawa's newest Paramount picture to follow "Hidden Pearls," which will be his next release, is "The Honor of His House," by Marion Fairfax and directed by William C. De Mille. The triangular love affair that develops in this story culminates in a feat in surgery by which blood transfusion is carried to its uttermost limits.

Florence Vidor has the chief feminine role.

FEATHERS AND FUR

The Universal Company is to be congratulated on its acquisition of an unusually fine series of bird and animal pictures taken by William L. Finley, Fish and Game Commissioner of Oregon. Decorative titles and captions that bring out the humorous and dramatic elements in the lives of the little wild creatures add greatly to the attraction and interest of the pictures.

The first of the series, released January 14, is "Wild Birds at Home." The troubles of Mr. Bob White in playing nursemaid to the newly-laid eggs, while Mrs. Bob White seeks a larger field of activity, is the first episode in this very pleasant reel. Then follow birds of another feather—the evil hawk, the great owl and his fluffy son, quite as capable as his father of staring you out of countenance, and that curious specimen known as the moneky-faced owl, who snatches and swallows in three great gulps the innocent mice that sport at his feet. How to catch a "wood pussy" so as to avoid the usual lamentable consequences is interesting and might prove useful. A raccoon, a weasel, the strange kangaroo rat that can live two years without a drink and a baby jack-rabbit are presented. Last to appear on the screen is a group of pretty little coyote pups found, as we are shown, at the end of a fifteen-foot tunnel built by their parents.

A splendid reel for the Children's Matinee, but as enjoyable for grown-ups.

FILMS OF BUSINESS CORP. MAKES ITS FIRST OFFERING

With two industrial pictures, notable for the care with which they are taken and their excellent photography, the Films of Business Corp., of which Camilla Donworth is founder and president, makes its entry into the field of the publicity film, with offices at 64 East Thirty-fourth street, New York.

Of the two subjects, that entitled "One of the Departments of a Great Industry," which shows the making of the celebrated Heinz's spaghetti with tomato, is best fitted for theatre purposes. The subject itself is of universal interest, while the beautifully equipped factory, the pleasant-looking men and women who direct the machinery that does the actual work and the unique character of the process of spaghetti-making itself render the film unusually interesting and attractive.

"The Making of Mephisto Augur Bits," taken at the factory of the W. A. Ives Manufacturing Co., is of too technical a character to be well suited for a theatre program, but reflects the greatest credit on the company producing it for the completeness with which it covers the subject and the excellent quality of its close-ups and illustrative scenes.

WHAT THE NEWS WEEKLIES OFFER

The big snowstorm of Chicago with its disastrous effects, the damage caused by the heavy ice blockade on the Atlantic coast and the march of the Allied troops through Italy on the way to the front are the outstanding features of the News Reels of the week.

Both No. 4 and No. 5 of the Mutual Weekly give space to conditions in Chicago. The amusing side of the situation is dealth with in No. 5, which pictures the call for help sent out by the newspapers and the response by bands of young women who turn out and shovel pathways of safety through the heavy drifts.

Weekly No. 5, by the way, is unusually good. The Italian scenes show French and British troops passing through the ancient hill cities of Solferino, Arcole and Rivoli, with their monuments to the great Napoleon; a band of Italian engineers throwing a wooden bridge across the Adige and a company of Bersaglieri mounted on bicycles. Subjects which the cameraman has treated with an eye to their picturesque qualities are the freight wreck in New Hampshire and the destruction by ice of the four-mile bridge at Salisbury, Mass. Both of these have pictorial and dramatic quality apart from their current interest.

Universal Current Events No. 37 starts off with pictures taken at Squantum, Mass., of Government officials using dynamite to break the ice sheet that kept the coal barges away from the ship-building plant. The "grand splash" that follows the explosion of the charge is satisfyingly spectacular. Foreign film pictures the famous French chasseurs riding through Turin on their way to the front, and scenes in the camp of the American artillery in France. Gun practice is serious business, but the day is enlivened by the antics of the artillery horse, who can develop as much temperament as an army mule, and the welcome call to "chow." Newspaper cartoonists from Omaha, Brooklyn and Detroit reflect the spirit of our war task.

Hearst-Pathe News No. 7 and No. 8 pay due respect to the Chicago situation, the blasting of ice in Squantum harbor, the railroad wreck in New Hampshire and the arrival of French troops in Brescia and Milan.

Issue No. 7 has exclusive features in pictures taken during construction and after completion of the buildings erected by the Government to house the vast army that carries on the executive and clerical work of the war in Washington, and in some picturesque views of Niagara clad in snow and ice. As in the case of the Mutual Weekly noted above, this last subject is a reminder of the fact that a News reel need not sacrifice beauty to current interest.

Issue No. 8, contrasting New York's busiest streets on a normal working day with their appearance on Heatless Monday, points the lesson by showing long trains of cars and numerous barges carrying coal to areas shivering in anticipation of a total dearth of fuel. An exclusive feature of great interest in this number shows American soldiers being instructed in the use of the French observation balloon.

CANADA AND THE WHEAT FIELDS

A comprehensive survey of the vast wheat industry of the dominion is given in the Essanay release, "How Canada and the Farmer Co-operate in Grain Raising" (General Film Company). The magnitude of the area covered and the labor involved, as well as the active part taken by the government to protect the character of the product and insure fair dealing are amply set forth in pictures showing the cultivation of the ground, harvesting and the various steps taken in transporting, testing and certifying the grain. Scenes at the great grain elevators built by the farmers themselves with government help, and in the mills, with close-ups of the grinders and sifters, bring the story of the precious wheat kernel down to the perfect loaf, the achievement of which, as we are reminded, is a patriotic duty and privilege.

WATER SPORTS

It's a long sail from the beach of Waikiki to Coeur d'Alene Lake in Idaho, but the popular pastime of surf-riding has found its way over and is pursued with great zeal and agility by the girls and men who disport in the Bruce picture, "Just for Joy" (Educational Films Corporation). Since of surf there isn't any, locomotion is had by hitching the board to the stern of a lake steamer. The result is quite as satisfying, and the possibilities of a plunge into the icy water so imminent that a swift motorboat is always in attendance for rescue work.

Water sports of another variety are indulged in at Astoria, a trading post founded at the mouth of the Columbia river by William Waldorf Astor's ancestor in 1811. Here they twirl the log, give chase to the wild goose and ride a water bicycle.

The film is enlivened with Mr. Bruce's characteristically humorous titles.

Short Subjects in Review

By Clara DeLissa Berg

Quimby Gives Cartoon a Boost

"All of the screen's comedians receive mention in the papers each week with the exception of those animated stars that are doing much to entertain humanity," said F. C. Quimby, Pathe sales manager, "and I think that the Katzenjammer Kids are the greatest of all comedians, for we have yet to record a single case wherein they have failed to be a howling success."

NIAGARA VERSUS THE COAL PROBLEM

A substitute for coal that doesn't need to be laboriously dug from the earth, piled into cars and shoved all over the country; a substitute that travels direct and instantaneously from its source to the consumer—it's something worth thinking about.

This is the substitute proposed by those who would build a power plant at Niagara capable of transmitting electricity over an area with a 500-mile radius, east to Boston, south to New York and west to Cincinnati. The subject is admirably set forth in Universal Screen Magazine No. 57, with an animated diagram and pictures of Niagara Gorge, the rapids and whirlpool, and some of the machinery which will generate or be operated by the current.

Almost as important and quite as interesting to watch on the screen is the method of cutting lake steamers into two parts to enable them to pass through the locks on their way to the ocean. This is no mere succession of snapshots, but a series of pictures and titles that make clear every step in this unique operation.

More human in character are the pictures of children who under the strain of ordinary school work would lose their eyesight, but who are being saved from this tragic fate through the efforts of the American Museum of Natural History. Under the guidance of one of the museum's staff these lucky children "take a trip" by sliding fingers over relief maps, and learn the manners and customs of the inhabitants through examining and handling their dress and utensils.

Those who enjoy shrimps a la Newburg—and who does not?—will view with interest the pictures showing the succulent shellfish being caught, cleaned and canned on their native Carolina coast.

WHAT PRUSSIA WANTS

In a startingly graphic manner, possible only to the screen, Paramount-Bray Pictograph No. 103 shows us in the light of past history what Prussia intends getting and keeping, unless the resistance she meets is as determined as her instinct and will to conquer. The House of Hohenzollern, a little black spot on the map of Europe some centuries ago, grows, with the passing of the generations, like a dark storm-cloud, blotting out adjoining kingdoms and appearing here and there in isolated colonies united in time to the parent country by the absorption of intervening lands. With the opening of 1918 Prussia, so far as land occupation is concerned, has realized her dream of a state stretching through the entire extent of middle Europe and over into Asiatic Turkey. Based on a monograph by Professor Johnson of Columbia University, the facts are incontrovertible. It is for us to answer the question, "How far shall the Prussian deluge sweep?"

An agreeable and less serious portion of the interesting number of the Pictograph shows the Washington Square Players training young followers in a school established to encourage acting of a less conventional type. The students not only learn the usual branches of the profession, including that of make-up and storm effects, but divided into groups rehearse and produce plays. We see the rehearsals of a scene and its production later in finished, costumed form.

A heavy snowstorm, taken in Maine, furnishes a number of exquisite views.

NATURE'S CAMOUFLAGE

Let little man pat himself on the back as the cleverest ever, and make a noise like the latest "Wuxtra." Madame Nature smiles and informs him she herself has done it, ever so long ago.

As he discovers if he happens to pick up a bit of twig and finds the thing a wiggling insect, or plucks a bunch of leaves that are in reality the wings and head of a bug.

Mr. Ditmars, in "Life in the Insect World" (Educational Films Corporation), throws on the screen for our close inspection a number of these unconscious mimics—caterpillars that group themselves so as to resemble flower clusters, moths whose brilliant underwings, used in the courting season, are concealed by a covering exactly resembling bark; a worm disguised by means of mock eyes as a monster of terrific aspect and remarkable studies of the "walking stick" and the Ceylonese leaf insect noted above. Madam Katydid, photographed head-on as she polishes her comely countenance and manicures her fingernails, supplies the comedy with which all good entertainments should conclude.

"Putting Fritz on the Water Wagon," An Animated Cartoon in Paramount-Bray Pictographs

Coal Comedy Made by Vitagraph

When Garfield Week descended on the industrial world of the Eastern States, the Vitagraph studio, like all other unexempted plants, shut down all operations dependent on coal; that is, artificial lighting and heat were eliminated. Some scenes were obtained in the sunlight and among these were several for a Vitagraph comedy in which Edward Earle and Agnes Ayres are featured.

The comedy was built around the coal scarcity and showed Earle as an exasperated young husband, whose wife kept nagging him because he could not get any coal. Finally, in desperation, he got a job as a coal-wagon driver and every load of coal he was ordered to deliver he deposited in his own cellar.

Exhibitors Receive Fox's "Les Miserables"

"Les Miserables," the William Farnum de luxe production produced by William Fox, has been released by the producer to exhibitors throughout the United States. The picture had a long run at the Lyric theatre in New York and was well received.

In a letter to William Fox, a professor of English at Yale University is said to have declared that everybody in America should see the picture and that its educational value is inestimable.

Metro Copies Newspaper for Scenes

The big city room of a New York daily newspaper was built in replica, Metro announced last week, for scenes in that company's forthcoming All-Star Series production, "Under Suspicion," co-starring Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne.

Will S. Davis directed the picture from the scenario of Albert Shelby Le Vino, which was based on Hugh Weir's story, "The Woolworth Diamonds."

February 5 Brings Strand Comedy

Billie Rhodes, in a Strand comedy, called "Her Friend Brown," has been announced by Mutual for release February 5.

The Mutual Weekly, released February 4, is said to keep pace with current events. Scenes from the battle-front, effects of heatless-day orders and the results of the recent blizzard, which swept the country, are shown.

General Introduces "Little Nell"

Essanay's General Film comedy, "Our Little Nell," is said by the latter company to afford something new in slapstick-Western melodrama burlesque. It tells the story of how "Little Nell," tipping the scales at a good 200 pounds, helps to capture the terrible villain of Dead Man's Gulch.

Keenan Heads Pathe New List

Other Stars for February 10 Include Doris Kenyon, Ruth Roland and Harry Pollard—Short Reels Also

THE Pathe program for the week of February 10 is announced by the company as an unusually strong one, the high lights in it being the first of the Keenan-Pathe plays and one of the "Animal-Movements-Analyzed" pictures, showing "The Horse in Action" in Pathe colors.

Frank Keenan makes his debut as a Pathe star in "Loaded Dice," Pathe plays special in five reels, produced by Pathe. This picture is a five-reel adaptation by the scenario writer and author, Gilson Willets, from Ellery H. Clark's book of the same name.

Doris Kenyon stars in the twelfth episode of "The Hidden Hand," entitled "The Eyes in the Wall," with Sheldon Lewis, Arline Pretty and Mahlon Hamilton; serial, two reels, produced by Pathe. Unusual and thrilling situations are said to develop in this chapter, in which Ramsey rescues Doris from Dr. Scarley, but is pursued by "The Hidden Hand" in an attempt to obtain the locket which contains the answer to the secret all wish to find.

Ruth Roland appears in the fourth episode of "The Price of Folly" series, under the title of "The Sin of Innocence," with Frank Mayo. The story deals with a young girl reared in the wilds as a child of purity and innocence and the tragedy that comes into her life as the result of her ignorance.

Harry Pollard stars in "Hello! Teacher," a one-reel comedy produced by Rolin. Mr. Pollard is featured in this picture with Bebe Daniels, also of the Lloyd comedies, as his leading lady.

The seventh issue of the "Argus Pictorial" is said to be very interesting, showing "Oystering in the Gulf of Mexico," "Liquid Drops and Globules," "The Ameba," the lowest form of animal life, and "The Thrip," a very undesirable inhabitant of green-houses.

A split-reel is "Rocamadour and the Valley of Lot," Pathe colored travel and "The Horse in Action," Pathe colord eeducational, taken with the ultra-rapid camera, showing the movements of the horse analyzed in every way.

An International Cartoon and Educational and Hearst-Pathe News Nos. 14 and 15, complete this program.

Walthall's First Paralta Play Ready

HENRY B. WALTHALL'S first Paralta play, "His Robe of Honor," which is the screen version of the book by Ethel and James Dorrance, is now ready for booking throughout the country, it was announced by Paralta this week.

The authors of the story, before devoting their attention to the writing of fiction, were both newspaper people on the New York dailies, and much of the material used in the story has been taken from facts concerning the political machines that "policy" kept from being printed in the papers, Paralta says.

The book was adapted for the screen by Julian Louis Lamothe and sets forth the story of a shyster lawyer who becomes an upright judge under the innate forces of a noble woman.

In the role of Julian Randolph, Henry B. Walthall is afforded an opportunity, Paralta says, for one of the strongest screen interpretations in which he has ever appeared. The early part of the story shows him as an unscrupulous, yet successful lawyer, amassing a fortune by blackmailing large corporations. He attracts the attention of a graft-permeated political machine and becomes a tool in its hands, just at the time he meets the one woman, whom he finally marries.

Supporting Mr. Walthall will be a company of players which includes Miss Mary Charleson, Lois Wilson, Fred Montague, Noah Berry, Jr., J. J. Dowling, Roy Laidlaw, Eugene Pallette and Guy Newhard.

The production was made under the direction of Rex Ingram.

Pathe Aids Woods in "Innocent" Opening

THE presentation on January 20 of Fannie Ward in "Innocent" at the Eltinge theatre in New York by A. H. Woods, the producer, has been announced by the Pathe Exchange as highly successful. The picture is Miss Ward's first Pathe play.

On the same stage where Mr. Woods started the spoken version of "Innocent" upon its stage voyage over the theatrical sea, "Innocent" was shown to an audience that filled the theatre.

Seven young ladies from the Pathe organization, the Misses Rosenzweig, Gilde, Thomson, Fortin, Muller, Block and Ginoris, dressed in Chinese costumes, acted as official hostesses and looked after the comfort of the guests.

At the conclusion of the showing, Pauline Frederick congratulated Fannie Ward upon her interpretation of the title role.

The performance was started with the two-reel Toto comedy, "A One Night Stand," as a curtain raiser, and then when the house had settled down the curtain was raised on a stage set in representation of a quaint street scene in old China. Incense from Chinese burners floated over the footlights and filled the body of the theatre and permeated the whole with a truly Oriental atmosphere.

Fannie Ward and her party occupied the lower right hand stage box. Opposite in the left hand stage box was Frank Keenan and his party.

In the Independent Field

"Tarzan of the Apes" Has Big Opening

The opening of "Tarzan of the Apes," which was given at the Broadway theatre Sunday night, was one of the most unusual Broadway has witnessed. The National Film Corporation opened with a special lobby display of the most unique kind and played to two dollar, top, house.

Earlier in the week, Harry Reichenbach, who is handling the publicity and advertising for the National Film Corporation, obtained permission to stretch a banner across Broadway, from the theatre to the Continental hotel, a breadth of one hundred feet. The banner announced the feature in thirty feet letters which could be seen for twenty blocks away.

Quarter and half-page display advertisements in the large circulation papers, six hundred thousand throw-aways and house-to-house cards reached the homes in the greater city by Friday, while plaster of Paris and papier mache plaques dotted important windows throughout the Longacre district, while eight hundred twenty-four sheet posters and twenty thousand smaller pieces of paper were placed on the billboards and snipe locations one week in advance.

Full column length stories and unusually strong advance stories characterized the publicity work the past week.

A huge ape took tickets at the door, while another ape of a different species handed out programs. The lobby of the theatre was made into a jungle scene with small monkeys dotting the foliage.

A review of the picture and opening will appear in next week's issue.

Is the Square Deal Thing of Past

Phil Goldstone Recounts Incident which Conclusively Proves That Business Ethics Are Still Adhered To

WE told you we were going to tell you about the state right's buyer who came to New York and left waving his hat and giving three cheers for the fair and square treatment he received from the seller of territorial rights.

The buyer is Phil Goldstone, Omaha, Neb., and the seller is W. H. Productions, of New York. And as was stated in our editorial columns last week, we received our information of the square deal from the buyer, not the seller. Mr. Goldstone is one of the most prominent buyers in the Middle West. Some weeks ago he negotiated with W. H. Productions for some of their Hart releases and Sennett produced comedies. The negotiations were not final, but Mr. Goldstone was given an option (made orally) on the stated features, for his territory of Missouri, Iowa, Kansas and Nebraska. It seems that another company had also negotiated for these subjects for its territory but had not closed the deal.

Several days later W. H. Productions closed with the other company for this territory, Mr. Goldstone not having notified W. H. Productions that he would take advantage of his option. Mr. Goldstone wired W. H. Productions for an explanation and he received a return answer, asking that he come to New York for a settlement. But—it is best to have Mr. Goldstone, himself, tell you the story. Remember he is the buyer and the one whose option had run out and the one who did not get the features for his territory.

"When I heard that W. H. Productions had closed with another company for the territory and the features which I had planned to get and for which I had taken an option, I felt sure that this was only another so-called "gyp" game and that I was the one "gyped." In answer to a wire which I received from W. H. Productions, asking that I come on to New York for the purpose of settlement, I firmly believed that the only settlement possible was to the effect that my absence had been taken advantage of and that my option had been entirely ignored.

"I came to New York fully expecting that I was to lose and never thinking for a moment that I would leave New York, giving three cheers for the W. H. Productions and its fair and square way of doing business. Remember that I had expended hundreds of dollars in billing my territory and that I had made a deposit as collateral for the non-performance of the oral agreement, so, naturally, I was apprehensive.

"On arriving in New York I went to the office of the W. H. Productions, 71 West Twenty-third street, expecting no redress but fully convinced to state my case and make the best of it. I was cordially received by a representative of the company who immediately, without preliminary remarks, launched into the subject of settlement.

"He asked me how much I stood to lose and I told him. He told me that he had disposed of the territory for which I had spoken and the features to another company. But, he said, I thoroughly appreciate the predicament in which I have placed you by swinging the deal to the other fellow and I stand ready to make good any loss you have suffered.

"First the amount which I had deposited with the W. H. Productions was returned. Then the expense which I had undergone in advertising the features which I was to have bought under the oral option, was figured. This amounted to considerable, running into four figures. Without further discussion a check was handed to me for this amount and the amount which I had deposited. In short, every cent that I stood to lose under the agreement was willingly given to me, the sum total amounting to close upon $10,000.

"Now, there was not a reason in the world—or none that I knew of—why the W. H. Productions could not have told me to go ahead and collect, if I could. As a matter of fact, considering the manner in which some carry on their methods of business dealings, I did not expect a cent. I fully expected that I was to receive the 'cold shoulder' and shown the door and told to do my 'darndest' to collect.

"I have heard of the 'square deal' and I have experienced it, but never under such circumstances and with such a show of wholeheartedness on the part of the fellow with the 'whip hand.' It is useless for me to say that I appreciate such treatment, and the incident will remain in my memory so long as I am able to remember anything or events.

"The W. H. Productions are entitled to a world of credit for the way in which they treated one of their clients. I am sorry to say that there are few such companies like the W. H. in this respect, in so far as I know personally. This is the sort of business that should inspire others toward better things. Business ethics in the motion picture industry is entitled to just as high a place as in any other business or profession, and the incident recited above indicates that there is at least one company, which I can cite, as having practiced business ethics as well as preached it.

Marketing Independent Features with Success

By Herbert Lubin—General Enterprises, Inc.

"I HEAR a great deal of talk about chaotic conditions existing at the present time in the marketing end of this business, especially in the selling of State Right pictures. Conditions, to my way of thinking, are such as we ourselves create. We have a great and spirited industry, the onward rush of which is irresistible, and as a whole, irresistibly successful.

"There are many loose ends, which are pretty well distributed along the way, from the production of the picture to its exhibition on the screen. These loose ends are simple, economical faults and internal weaknesses. When a picture of a theatre fails, the reason is often offered as 'bad business and chaotic conditions.' On the other hand, everyone knows there are many successful pictures and successful theatres right under the noses of the failures.

"The fundamental principle of business, when applied to the marketing end of pictures, or to any other branch relating to motion pictures, is really no different than when applied to any other legitimate industry. All effort, genius and energy required in the launching of other merchandizing products must be likewise utilized in the marketing of a picture product to insure its ultimate success.

"'Just Pictures' are not sufficient today—the public will not have them. That may be one of the reasons why others may find it difficult to sell State Right pictures, but with a picture that is a box office special in every sense of the word, you will find no difficulty in disposing of same, and you will find no 'bad business and chaotic conditions.'

"We have made it our aim to handle nothing but good pictures with big box office possibilities. We have so far been successful in marketing to State Right exchanges such pictures as 'The Warrior' and 'Mother." These pictures are not recognized and acknowledged by the press, film distributors throughout the country and, most important of all, by the exhibitors themselves to be big winners. We bought these pictures at what we considered fair prices and disposed of them to our buyers at reasonable prices, with the result that everyone interested, from the producer to the patron of the moving picture theatre, is satisfied. There can be only one result in the distribution of State Right specials along these lines. No trouble selling them; no 'bad conditions'; satisfied State Right buyers; satisfied exhibitors, which means a satisfied public. It simply means that good pictures properly exploited will find a good market—which brings me to the most important item in connection with the successful selling of pictures—proper exploitation.

"Of course, even good pictures, cannot distribute or exhibit themselves automatically. We have, therefore, used all our efforts to assist the various distributors and exhibitors throughout the country in presenting our pictures on the screen. We have used all means possible known to publicity to help exploit our productions, and we feel by rendering all the assistance possible to our buyers even after the sale has been consummated, and by helping them to make a success of our pictures, we are establishing and building a proper connection, which means easier marketing for our future productions.

"We feel that by applying sound business principles to the marketing of state right pictures, there is no reason why they cannot be sold successfully and everyone connected with the handling of the picture makes money."

Hoffman Agrees with Brenton

M. H. Hoffman, Foursquare Pictures, Comments Upon Statement of Chairman of National Board of Review of New York

CRANTON BRENTON'S statement in the New York World that the war is affecting the quantity of film product warrants scrutiny by those in the industry who are anxious to preserve its stability is endorsed by M. H. Hoffman, of Foursquare Pictures, in the following statement made in endorsing Mr. Brenton's remarks. Mr. Brenton is chairman of the National Board of Review of New York City.

Mr. Hoffman sees in the statistics furnished by Mr. Brenton evidence of the utmost value to producers, distributors and exhibitors. He does not believe that there should be any anxiety felt over the fact that the output has decreased in 1917. On the contrary, it is his opinion that the reduced number of pictures, which will doubtless prevail in 1918, will have the effect of increasing the quality.

"What may appear to be at first glance to be a contraction of business with respect

"What may appear at first glance to be a contraction of business with respect to all in the industry must prove, upon thoughtful examination, to be a cloud having a silver lining," said Mr. Hoffman. "I predict that there will ensue a degree of watchfulness and care on the part of both producers and distributors which will put them in a far stronger position at the close of 1918 than they now hold. The constructive business men in the industry are now fully awake. They recognize the need for the elimination of waste; for tightening the loose portions of their respective machines.

"The producer, of intelligence, will select his stories with greater caution than ever before. He next will have made the most practicable scenario possible, so that there shall be no last-minute changes to be made. Then, a carefully laid out schedule of costs will be prepared and the actual work done in a manner permitting no extravagances or loss of time or materials. I do not say that all producers will follow such a course; but I do contend that those who consider the interests of the distributor and exhibitor will do so."

Warren to Begin Work on Special Production

Edward Warren, who recently signed a long term contract with the Arrow Film Corporation as a result of which all of his future pictures will be released through the latter organization, will shortly begin work on his first super feature under the new arrangement.

"We shall decide within the next few days on the first picture," said Mr. Warren. "This will be selected from several big stories that we have options on, by a special board of experts appointed by the Arrow Film Corporation and the Warren organization and production will commence immediately afterwards."

"Souls Redeemed" and "Weavers of Life," the last two Warren productions, have been taken over by the Arrow Film for distribution.

First Comedy Announced by W. H.

W. H. Productions Company announces the first Sennett-produced two-reel comedy to be released is "A Small Town Bully," with Roscoe Arbuckle, Owen Moore, Mabel Normand and Mack Sennett.

Many of the scenes of this comedy are laid in the village school house. Miss Normand is the teacher. Her leading pupils are Mack Sennett, Roscoe Arbuckle and Owen Moore.

Mildred Harris Is Starred by Lois Weber in Jewel's "The Doctor and the Woman"

Arrow Has Big Features on List

As a forerunner of the plans laid by the Arrow Film Corporation for the present year, it is announced by the officials of this company that a long-term contract has been entered into with the Edward Warren Productions whereby the latter is to produce a certain number of features for distribution through the Arrow Film Corporation.

The Warren productions completed to date, which will find an outlet to the exhibitor through the agencies of the Arrow Film Corporation, are: "Souls Redeemed" and "Weavers of Life." Other features on the Arrow list are W. H. Clune's production of "The Eyes of the World," "Ramona," and Mayfair's production of "Persuasive Peggy," with Peggy Hyland featured.

Warner Gets Reassuring Message

W. H. Productions has sent the following letter to A. Warner, Standard Film Service Company, Cleveland, Ohio. The letter speaks for itself:

"We are informed that unauthorized copies from duped negatives are being exploited by unscrupulous parties in your territory. Mailing you tomorrow sworn affidavit proving we own original negatives seventeen two-reel Hart releases and that you are the only authorized distributor of original prints of these releases in Ohio and Kentucky. We authorize you to advertise this statement in local trade papers and in your circulars to exhibitors.

"(Signed) W. H. Productions."

"Life or Honor" Next Ivan Feature

"Life or Honor," directed by Edmund Lawrence, is the next release of Ivan Film Productions. Leah Baird is featured in the picture. James Morrison, in a dual role, is in chief support. Violet Palmer has the ingenue lead. One of the prominent characters in "Life or Honor" is Ben Hendricks, who is well known on the spoken stage. His characterization of the somewhat crabbed old bachelor and woman-hater is said to be most picturesquely presented in this picture.

Hart Features Playing Return Engagements

"Our Hart pictures are doing a wonderful business all over the state," said Leon D. Netter, manager of the Masterpiece Film Attractions, which is releasing the Hart five-reel re-issues on a state's right basis. We have had a second run for "The Cold Deck" in every town in which it had a first run. Demands are coming in on all sides for our other Hart pictures, "The Hellhound of Alaska," and "The Bandit and the Preacher." L. B. Cool, district manager for the Feiber Shea Circuit, has booked the entire Hart series for his houses in Canton, Youngstown and Ashtabula.

Recognized Star in "Natural Law"

Marguerite Courtot, Star of France Films Production, "Natural Law," Has Played in Biggest Productions — Offered on Open Market

"THE NATURAL LAW," distributed by France Films, Inc., has for its star Marguerite Courtot. In the principal supporting roles are seen Howard Hall and George Larkin. The production is in six reels and is offered on the independent market. It is adapted from the stage success of the same name.

Charles H. France, president of France Films, Inc., has not offered this feature on the market before, owing to the fact that all preliminary arrangements for the most effective method of distribution had not been perfected until the present month. The picture was shown for review at the Broadway theatre some weeks ago and since then, Mr. France has been making a careful study of market conditions. He has definitely decided to dispose of his production on the open market and has already disposed of the foreign rights to J. Frank Brockliss, Inc. The deal for the foreign rights to this production was closed in fifteen minutes after Mr. Brockliss had seen the film. An extensive advertising campaign has been launched in all the trade papers and Mr. France announces that he is receiving daily inquiries from many of the most prominent buyers throughout the country, asking for detailed information on the production and the method of disposition.

Marguerite Courtot, who is featured in "The Natural Law," is a recognized artist before the camera. Miss Courtot's first work before the camera was five years ago when she played in Gaumont stock. Later she went with Kalem and worked in comedy-drama productions. She played opposite Guy Coombs, Tom Moore and others who were at that time favorites with the public. Miss Courtot's work in "The Natural Law" was pronounced by critics and the press to be of the A-1 quality. Since finishing "The Natural Law" Miss Courtot has completed "The Unbeliever," a special production by the Edison Company. She is co-starred with Raymond McKee. "The Natural Law" and "The Unbeliever" are the first two independent productions in which she has worked.

Miss Courtot is one of the best known players on the screen. Her pictures have circulated the globe as is testified to by the many letters which she has received from fans in the Orient and Europe. Recently she received a letter from Japan which stated that she had been voted the most popular screen star.

Howard Hall and George Larkin, who are in chief support of Miss Courtot in "The Natural Law," are both well known to the public. Mr. Hall is perhaps better known to lovers of the speaking drama. He will be remembered as the doctor in Richard Bennett's success, "Damaged Goods." Mr. Hall wrote "The Natural Law" and was responsible for its production on the stage. George Larkin will be remembered for his work in the "Grant, Police Reporter," series, produced by Kalem. Mr. Larkin had the principal male role opposite Ruth MacTammany in "Alma, Where Do You Live?"

King-Bee Seeks Girls for New Comedy

Louis Burstein, president of the King-Bee Film Corporation, who will present Billy West in a five-reel comedy entitled, "Old King Sol," intends to have the handsomest girls that he can procure in this comedy, which he will start making as soon as peace is declared, it has been announced.

He will leave his Hollywood Studio, and will make a trip to every city from Los Angeles to New York, signing up one beauty from each city, to appear in "Old King Sol."

This bevy of feminine perfection, according to plans, is to be advertised as the most beautiful collection of girls, from all parts of the United States. Each girl will be billed with the name of the city she comes from.

Sawyer and Lubin Report Success

Arthur H. Sawyer and Herbert Lubin Report Big Success with General Enterprises Features, "Mother" and "The Warrior"

ARTHUR H. SAWYER and Herbert Lubin report the successful consummation of an entirely original sales scheme which they placed in operation in Boston in the interests of the state right feature, "Mother." The two executives of General Enterprises, Inc., reversed the usual procedure of disposing of the picture to New England buyers by first booking it in one of Boston's leading photoplay theatres in order that its drawing powers might be fully tested.

The picture was shown at the Tremont Temple and following the first day's run, immediately established itself as a box office attraction, it is announced. Messrs. Sawyer and Lubin received many bids from prominent New England buyers who witnessed the showing. "Mother" was disposed of for the entire New England states to the Boston Photoplay Company, represented by Edward Golden, pioneer exchange man and well known throughout New England. The picture will be exploited on an extensive scale by Mr. Golden.

"The Warrior" opened at the Boston theatre and ran a week. The management of the Boston theatre has contracted for another seven days' booking on the strength of the showing made by the General Enterprises feature. Messrs. Sawyer and Lubin are now preparing to distribute the latest addition to their string of state right features, "The Crucible of Life," a seven-part melodrama of the war, starring Grace Darmond and Jack Sherrill, and adapted from the famous stage success, "Fairfax."

Wohlfarth and Westfall Get Educationals

E. W. Hammons, vice-president of the Educational Film Corporation, has contracted with Wohlfarth & Westfall of the Atlantic Film Company, to handle their entire output in the Northern New Jersey towns. Many of the leading theatres of New Jersey already have these pictures booked. One Bruce scenic each week and a Ditmar's animal picture every second week, starting January 28, will be the order of release. The McClure picture, "Mother," is also distributed throughout New Jersey by the Atlantic Film Company.

Clune's Productions to Show in Canada

W. H. Clune's productions, "The Eyes of the world" and "Ramona" will be shown throughout Canada, it is announced, by Charles H. Haystead, representative of the A. J. Small Circuit of Canadian theatres, who was in New York last week completing plans for the exploitation of the pictures. Both features are to be shown with special scenic, musical and lighting effects in all the principal theatres. The plans for the exploitation of the Clune productions were arranged by the Arrow Film Corporation.

Ryan Pleased with First Jester Comedies

Phil Ryan, Standard Film Exchange, Kansas City, Mo., writes Jester Comedy Company that he was pleased with the first two Jester comedies featuring Twede-Dan, "The Recruit" and "His Golden Romance." William Steiner, who is touring the country with prints of the first two Jester productions, reports success.

Buyers Praise First Hart Feature

Reports received from the various exchanges throughout the country by W. H. Productions Company, indicate that their first Hart feature, "The Two-Gun Man" in "The Bargain," is meeting with big success.

T. E. Larson, manager of Favorite Feature Company, which control the rights for Oklahoma, Texas and Arkansas, says: "Our success with "The Bargain" has been exceptionally good. We have closed practically every big town, and the future looks very bright to us." Harry Bernstein, manager for the Jake Wells' organization in the South, says: "Bookings are coming in very steadily on this Hart production, and four salesmen are now combing the territory. We are quite satisfied that this will be one of the biggest money makers the exhibitors have had for a long time." Tom Moore of Washington, D. C., who is playing "The Two-Gun Man" at his Strand theatre, states: "I turned them away my first two days, and expect to do a land office business for the balance of my run of this production."

"Crucible of Life" Shown for Review

The date set for the showing of General Enterprises, Inc., "The Crucible of Life," was changed from Thursday, January 24, to Tuesday night the 29th. The change was made necessary by the fuel conservation order issued by Dr. Garfield.

The showing was held in the ball room of Hotel Astor. A special musical program was given and the Camp Upton quartette gave several selections. Following the showing a dinner was given to the members of the press. Grace Darmond and Jack Sherrill are the featured members of the cast which presents "The Crucible of Life."

Brouse Arranges with Unger for Service

Henry Brouse, who controls the First National Exhibitors' Circuit franchise for Eastern Canada, announces that he has completed arrangements with J. J. Unger of the Metro Film Service, whereby the latter exchange will handle all First National releases, including the forthcoming "Signature Protected" Chaplin Comedies. Mr. Brouse still owns the franchise and retains his full rights as a member of the Circuit, the new affiliation being solely an exchange convenience which both parties feel will prove mutually beneficial.

Swain to Appear Next in L-Ko Comedy

Max Swain will make his next appearance on the screen in a L-Ko two-reel comedy, titled "Ambrose and the Lionhearted." The famous comedian will drop the work of the slapstick comedian in this picture and give an exhibition of straight comedy rather than that of the slapstick brand. Rae Godfrey is working opposite the comedian in the principal feminine role.

Marguerite Snow and King Baggot Are Secret Service Operatives in Detective Chief Flynn's "The Eagle's Eye," Which Will Be Distributed by M. H. Hoffman, Inc.

Praise Wharton's "Eagle's Eye"

First Three Episodes Shown Elicit High Praise—Lusitania Sinking Shown—Plan to Destroy Ansonia Revealed

EXHIBITORS who saw the private showing of the first three episodes of "The Eagle's Eye," the serial photodrama based on an Imperial German spy exposure by Chief Flynn, have spoken in the highest terms of it as a serial production. Sets that occupy the entire stage floor of the big Wharton studios, at Ithaca, follow one after the other in the making of the episodes.

"It has always been our ambition to present a serial that would have as much class and show as expensive settings in each episode as are observed in a big feature production," said Theodore W. Wharton, who was in New York last week, "and we believe that in 'The Eagle's Eye' we have achieved that ambition."

The Whartons displayed a new feature in photography at the recent trade showing of "The Eagle's Eye" in what they describe as "the triple iris"—three diaphragms opening at once and disclosing three characters and then fading and showing a scene in which these characters appear in action.

The Whartons announce also a new form of "close up" which will be made a feature of the photography of a later episode in the "The Eagle's Eye" serial.

This photographic innovation was originated by "Ted" Wharton. He believes it a new idea of great value and until it has actually been presented in "The Eagle's Eye" only the head of the Wharton photographic department and himself will know how the effect is attained.

In the first episode of the new Wharton serial in which Chief Flynn is exposing the plots of the German Government's spies in America, he makes public the story of the Lusitania medal and shows it on the screen.

The sinking of the Lusitania was the result of a very carefully laid plan on the part of the Imperial German naval staff, aided by the leaders of the Imperial German Government's spy organization in this country. It was decided to destroy her at any cost and most elaborate plans were formulated to make her destruction on May 5, 1915, a certainty. In the face of these plans, and treachery in the wireless room of the great liner, she had only one chance in a million to get through the net set for her.

In the first episodes of "The Eagle's Eye," Chief Flynn shows how information of the sailing of the Lusitania was sent to Cuxhaven and how hundreds of scout boats patrolled the sea to notify submarines by wireless of any changes made in her course.

Chief Flynn is in receipt of the following letter from John McE. Bowman, president of company operating Ausonia and Biltmore Hotel, New York, complimenting him on the success of his serial:

"I have just returned from viewing your wonderful film, 'The Eagle's Eye,' and I am so much impressed with its power to do good that I must write you this line to congratulate you.

"The episode connected with the Hotel Ansonia was particularly interesting to me on account of the hours of mental anguish we all went through before the navigating officers of our fleet were out of danger and in viewing the picture I realize more than ever the strain you were under during that dreadful twenty-four hours.

"Most pictures of this kind border on the melodramatic, but this has not one ounce in it but is really dramatic from beginning to end; and if at the end of the third episode, when you ask people in the audience if they are not going to help destroy German autocracy, I am much mistaken if the appeal does not bring the spectators from their seats into a loud declaration of loyalty for this great country in which they are living. I, personally, with the cold sober thought in my mind that it was only a picture, could hardly restrain from rising up and giving the answer the appeal called for.

"It is extraordinarily well done, has the touch of authenticity behind it and will convey a wonderful message to the doubting ones, some of whom still believe we should be neutral.

"Wishing you every success in the wonderful story you are putting before the public, believe me.

"(Signed) JOHN McE. BOWMAN."

Miss Williams Heads Company

Edna Williams, General Manager, Robertson-Cole Film Department, Handling U. S. Exhibitors' Corporation's Features

One of the handful of successful women who are heading their own organizations is Miss Edna Williams, general manager of the Robertson-Cole Film Department, famous exporters of New York and London, to which concern has been allotted the foreign territorial rights to all productions distributed by the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation.

In her office in the Times Building she directs virtually single handed one of the largest enterprises now operating in the foreign film field. She is in touch with prominent exhibitors in all parts of the globe.

It was through their faith in her farsightedness and business acumen that officials of the Robertson-Cole Company determined to expand their vast organization in order to take up the business of distributing motion pictures. Today they have branch offices in cities as remote as Sydney, Singapore and Calcutta and when a production is put upon the domestic market by the U. S. corporation it is offered almost simultaneously to exhibitors on the other side of the world.

In less than three months this enterprising young woman has established by her own efforts a distributing organization that has become an important factor in the foreign field. It is her intention to distribute only special productions, subjects above the accepted program standard of merit, as she believes there is a larger demand for that kind of pictures in the foreign field than for ordinary program material.

She had won high success as an amateur composer in Los Angeles. She was appointed special representative in this country for one of the leading Australian film concerns and it was in the service of this company that she fitted herself for the more important duties she now has undertaken. During her leisure time, Miss Williams wrote songs, both words and music. Recently she wrote practically all of the songs for an elaborate act staged by Carter de Haven.

She also has marketed in the foreign territories the Edgar Lewis production "The Bar Sinister" and Edwin Carewe's "Her Fighting Chance," both of which subjects were controlled by Frank Hall Productions, Inc.

When Mr. Hall conceived the idea of starting the U. S. Exhibitors' Booking Corporation, he suggested to Miss Williams that she take over the marketing of the subjects released by the company in the foreign field. Whereupon she interested the film of Robertson-Cole, one of the largest importing concerns in the world. With foreign connections in nearly every large port in the land, and many smaller ones, Robertson-Cole took up the marketing of U. S. productions on a large scale. Today the subjects released by the Hall organization embracing "The Zeppelin's Last Raid," "Those Who Pay" and "The Belgian" are being sold in every part of the world.

"I have spent the past year in studying the foreign film market from New York, very closely," declared Miss Williams. "I have realized that there are many obstacles to be overcome before one can really dispose of pictures in foreign countries as they should be marketed. It is virtually a lottery. Naturally, many sales have been a distinct loss to the purchasers in the different territories and it has been my idea that a company with branch offices in the principal foreign cities would overcome all these disadvantages. Hence the organization of the company through which the U. S. productions are distributed in the foreign markets."

Hesperia Films Enters World Market

Hesperia Films Company, Inc., is the newest addition to the ranks of the film exploiters on the world market. Edgar O. Brooks has been elected vice-president and general manager.

The Hesperia Company will handle features of both domestic and foreign manufacture, for exploitation in the United States, Canada, Cuba, South America, and Central America, with a probability of extending its operations later to Australasia China, Japan, Philippines, India and South Africa.

Mr. Brooks recently resigned the general sales management of the Mutual Film Corporation, after a connection lasting upward of two years, and was previously affiliated with the firms of Gaumont, Universal, and Cosmofotofilm. He handled every branch of the business end of motion pictures during six years of active participation in the American field.

Hesperia's first release will be "Morok," a seven-reel picturization of Eugene Sue's work, "The Wandering Jew." A private trade showing of "Morok" was given last week at Wurlitzer Fine Arts hall.

Strand Shows Normand Film

Mabel Normand in the Goldwyn picture, "Dodging a Million," was the center of interest at the Strand Theatre in New York the week of January 28. This marked the stars debut as a Goldwyn player.

A Ditmar scenic was also included in the program.

They "Support" Arbuckle

Supporting Roscoe "Fatty" Arbuckle in all his comedies for Paramount release are Alice Lake, Al St. John and Buster Keaton. In Arbuckle's newest comedy, "Out West," it is said Al lives up to his reputation as a bad man, while Buster assumes the character of a Western gambler—a laughable caricature of Jack Rance. Alice Lake is a Salvation Army girl.

Catherine Calvert Has Good Stage Record

Catherine Calvert who is featured in Frank A. Keeney Pictures Corporation's first special feature, now under production under the direction of James Kirkwood, has been seen on the stage in some of the most successful stage productions including, "The Deep Purple" and "A Romance of the Underworld."

It was announced that Miss Calvert's first picture would be "The Girl Who Saw Life." Mr. Keeney announces this week that it has been decided to release "A Romance of the Underworld" first. The change was made upon the request of many who wished to see Miss Calvert make her debut under the management of Mr. Keeney in a screen version of her late husband, Paul Armstrong's drama, "A Romance of the Underworld." She will appear later in "The Girl Who Saw Life."

"A Romance of the Underworld" tells a thoroughly human and interesting story of life and political intrigue. A widely influential politician sets out to accomplish the downfall of a young business man and at the same time to win the affections of the young man's sister. There are highly dramatic episodes, it is said, including a courtroom scene in which sensation blends with comedy.

Ebenstein Reports Good Business in West

Robert R. Ebenstein, sales manager, Sterling Pictures Corporation, reports from the Middle West that conditions are very good. For the past ten days Mr. Ebenstein says that he has made record sales of "Peg O' the Sea," the Sterling feature in which Jean Sothern is starred. More than 60 per cent of the country was disposed of in this time, he reports.

Ivan Productions in Southwest

The American Film Exchange, Fort Worth, Tex., one of the distributors for Ivan Film Production in the Southwest, reports favorably on the success of "One Law For Both" and "Sins of Ambition," two features purchased recently for this territory. Peter G. Booth is supervising the work of the American Film Exchange, in exploiting Ivan productions in this territory.

W. H. Provides Films for Camps

W. H. Productions Company, following its announced desire to promote better moral conditions in the training and recreation camps of the American soldiers in France, is providing in co-operation with the Community Motion Picture Bureau and the National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A., thousands of feet of film for the cost of printing.

It seems probable other distributors will do their bit along these lines.

In and Out of West Coast Studios

By J. G. Jessen

CHARLEY CHAPLIN made the first scenes Wednesday of last week for his first release through the First National Exhibitors' Association. The scenes made up to this time are mostly of a mob nature, more than fifty extra people being used. The only players selected to this time are Edna Purviance, who is to play lead opposite, and Henry Bergman, the heavyweight comedian.

The Chaplin Studio is now completed with the exception of work on the grounds such as building concrete walks, landscape gardening, etc., and it will be possible for Mr. Chaplin to proceed with production without further delay. He plans that his first release shall be made about March 1.

Vitagraph Stages Benefit

A benefit was given on the big stage at the Vitagraph Hollywood Studio, Friday evening, January 18, under the direction of Nell Shipman to aid Harry Smith, formerly a member of the Vitagraph stock company, who is ill with tuberculosis. A jazz band furnished music for a dance, and there were vandeville numbers at each intermission. Montgomery and Rock, by the aid of their trained duck, gave several operatic selections. Jack Pearce, former skating entertainer, operated the rollers. Harry Burns, champion bag puncher, was on for an exhibition, there was toe dancing by Madeline Marion, and several of William Duncan's prize students in the manly art, staged three-round bouts. The benefit netted nearly $500 which was given by Miss Shipman to the unfortunate actor.

William Duncan, who is making the completing scenes for the Vitagraph serial, "Vengeance and the Woman," before taking up his new work as director of serials for Pathe, was last week elected to membership to the Motion Picture Directors' Association of studio number one.

Changes at Triangle

There have been several changes at the Triangle during the past week. Ollie Sellers, manager of production at the plant, since the resignation of Frank Beresford, who was scenario editor, has taken on the duties of this department, but it is understood that this is only to be a temporary arrangement.

In the comedy department, Albert Glassmire, who has been director of production, tendered his resignation early last week, and up to this time J. Farrell Macdonald, who served as his assistant, has been looking after the duties of this office. One or two of the writers, including Walter MacNamara and Fred Bennett, left the comedy department when Mr. Glassmire resigned. Reggie Morris, director, has tendered his resignation which has been accepted, and he has left the Triangle. Because of Morris leaving the company, it has been found necessary to reduce the comedy stock, and about twenty regular people have left.

Too much work under artificial light has caused practically every member of Director Jack Dillon's troop producing "Betty Comes Home," to take time off because they are suffering from what is termed "Klieg-eye." Myrtle Lind was the first to be affected with this, and soon all were ready for the dark rooms and solitary confinement. Jack Gilbert is leading man opposite Miss Lind in this subject, he taking the role of a rich youth who seeks to make his way in the world serving as a chauffeur. A compromising situation serves to help round out the comedy drama.

Lasky States Plans

Jesse L. Lasky returned to Hollywood the first of last week and announced to the local press that owing to unsatisfactory weather conditions and fuel shortage, all the producing activities of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation would be transferred to the west coast as speedily as possible.

Wallace Reid and Ann Little, who went East with Donald Crisp for the making of one film, are expected back within a week, and following these will come Elsie Ferguson early in February, and a little later Billie Burke and possibly Lina Cavalieri.

Joseph Kauffman is the only director to come West, and it is very probable the others will be selected from the Los Angeles film colony. In May Mr. Lasky said Fred Stone will come to the coast for one of more productions.

A large ship was destroyed by a mine in the Pacific Ocean, just off the coast at Balboa Beach during the past week, under the direction of William C. deMille, who is filming an adaptation from "The Honor of His Country," starring Sessue Hayakawa, who has Florence Vidor as his leading woman. The principals leaped to the water from the deck of the boat at the time of the explosion.

Lasky players including Louise Huff, Harrison Ford, Helen Jerome Eddy, under the direction of Horace B. Carpenter, staged "The Tragedy of Man," by John Mayfield, Friday evening of last week at the Lasky Studio theatre. An admission of $1 was charged, and the proceeds given to the Hollywood Studio Club for girls.

William C. deMille will stage four one-act playettes at the Hollywood Community theatre. The plays are, "In 1999," "The Land of the Free."

Paralta Studios Complete

Progress of the construction work on the new Paralta stages and buildings necessary has gone forward with such speed that now all are in readiness for use. In fact, all of the stages have been christened by the making of scenes thereon, and within a few days directors and players will move into their offices and dressing rooms in the new building.

Three companies are now at work at the Paralta plant. Raymond B. West during the past week directed the making of scenes showing the arrival of an aeroplane bearing an English gentleman of wealth to a Scotch village where he meets Bessie Barriscale, the lassie heroine of the "Maid of the Storm," which is the title of the production now being filmed.

Eliot Howe is ready to commence work on the next Henry Walthall subject, but the making of scenes has been delayed because of the illness of Walthall and his leading woman, Mary Charleson, who have been ill since they returned from several days spent on a ranch in Arizona where they filmed the last scenes for "Hoops of Steel."

Bessie Barriscale is supervising the Red Cross work at the Paralta Studio, and this week secured two different donations from members of the producing staff. On one occasion the second Barriscale subject, "Within the Cup" was given the final studio run, and all members of the staff were invited to attend at twenty-five cents admission. On another day Monte Katterjohn received a New Year's cake from his mother in Indiana, and Miss Barriscale, in a Hooverizing manner, took possession, and sold it at twenty-five cents per slice, thereby securing something better than $5 from the fortunate ones who desired Indiana fruit cake.

Wind Damages Universal

Damage estimated at $10,000 was wrought at Universal City last week by a wind storm which blew at a thirty-mile-an-hour velocity. The roofs of buildings were blown from their resting place, and carried hundreds of feet. Settings on the open air stages were blown down and considerable damage was done to furniture and other props, to say nothing of the great quantity of diffusing cloth that was torn to shreds. The storm also caused considerable loss as it made work impossible for nearly four hours, thus keeping the several companies at the studio from working.

Allen J. Holubar is now directing Dorothy Phillips in a five-reel Bluebird production which is known as "The Mortgaged Wife." Story for this was written by Frank H. Clark, and Holubar prepared the screen version. Supporting cast selected includes William Stowell, Edwin August, Sam deGrasse and a number of others.

A number of new players will make their Universal debut in the subject now in production of Rea Berger which is titled "Are Children Luxuries?" Winifred Greenwood, True Boardman and Harry Dunkinson are all new people for Universal and cast for important parts. Little Zoe Rae has the featured role. The story for this photoplay was written by Charles Turner Dazey, and Frank H. Clark prepared the scenario.

An Indian village in New Mexico, which is said to have heretofore escaped the eye of the camera, will serve as setting for a number of scenes in the Bluebird production, "The Heart of the Desert," which has just been filmed by Wilfred Lucas, with Monroe Salisbury and Ruth Clifford as co-stars.

Metro in 'Frisco

But one Metro company was working at the studio last week, the other having gone to San Francisco to spend five or six days to secure the water scenes for "Breakers Ahead." General Western Representative B. A. Rolfe has leased several ocean-going boats on which most of the scenes will be made. The company took with them to San Francisco more than a thousand dollars' worth of explosives needed for the night and explosion scenes that will be filmed. Clifford Bruce, who plays the masculine lead in this picture, will have a number of thrilling adventures to perform. Charles Brabin is the director, and the company includes twenty people. Russell Simpson, well-known speaking stage actor, who has been with the American and Paralta for the past several months, has been engaged for an important character role in this film which will feature Viola Dana.

Director Frank Reicher is using a number of large sets at the studios where he is working on the Edith Storey picture titled "The Claim."

Tod Browning, who directed the first two Metro-Storey pictures, is working with B. A. Rolfe in editing "Revenge." This will be completed by the end of the coming week, and Mr. Browning will then leave for New York where he will direct two pictures for Metro. It is not definitely known whether the star will be Mme. Nazimova or Ethel Barrymore.

Fox Titles in East

In the future productions made at the William Fox Studio, in Los Angeles, will not be titled at the producing plant. The important matter of selecting a name will be taken care of by the New York office of the Fox organization. At the studio the subject will be known only by number. The cause of this change is the fact that publicity matter has been confusing because of changes made in the titles after the completed film has reached the releasing offices.

Charles Kenyon has written a photoplay for Fox which will star Gladys Brockwell. The scenes are laid in France in recent years, and a part of the story will contain events in the Apache district of Paris. The principal role is spoken of as requiring portrayal of two distinct characters as represented in the same person. E. J. LeSaint will be the director, and the principal players assigned are Lucile Younge, William Scott and Bertram Grassby.

Frank Lloyd and his cameraman, Billy Foster, have secured a number of remarkable effects for the photoplay starring Bertha Mann, the plot of which deals with the divorce evil of the present day in this country. The drama is said to be a very powerful one with new situations of a decidedly unique character.

Chet Franklin and company, which is headed by Jewel Carmen, during their recent stay in the Bear Lake Valley district, secured some very attractive scenes to be used in the photoplay in contrast with those that show the crowded city. The plot of this photoplay is said to have a distinction in that characteristics both interesting and lovable are shown by the player who has a criminal record that is shown almost through the entire length of the story.

Comedy Companies Busy

Five companies are now working on Keystone and Triangle comedies. Herman Raymaker with Billy Franey, Maude Wayne, Dora Rogers and others, are still at work on "A Playwright's Wrong." Many of the scenes for this are laid within a motion picture theatre, and it is here that many of the players are forced to double in the same scene—in other words, they play the part of actors on the screen, and then have their backs to the camera as part of the audience.

"Her Bohemian Party," a society crook comedy, features Ruth Langston, supported by Eugene Corey, Arthur Moon and others, as well as Joseph "Baldy" Belmont. This will be of one reel.

Reggie Morris, director, is back at the Triangle after an absence of ten days due to la grippe, and is now at work on "Three Hats and Two Heads." The complications in this concern the mix-up of two creations by the same milliner that cause a great deal of trouble. Rae Godfrey, Frank Bond, Rose Carter, Martin Kinney, Marian Torre are principals.

Paddy Maguire is still working in "A Rough Diamond," which has a big cast that includes more than a dozen of the well-known players of the Triangle. Many of the scenes were taken this week in one of the large Los Angeles jewelry stores where the camera played upon thousands of dollars worth of gems.

By the end of the week Director Beaudine will have completed the two-reeler "Flinging It," spoken of as a muddle of mud and money, with Max Asher and Ray Griffith as principals.

Screen Examinations

Bringing Them Into a Close-Up

By Longacre

WHEN is a five-reeler a five-reeler? When does it contain five thousand feet, forty-five hundred or fifty-one hundred feet? This question has long agitated the exhibitor, and the accepted terms by which the length of a film is judged mean little or nothing to him. The term "five reels" has long since ceased to mean five thousand feet. It only means five reels or five spools, and the amount of footage on them can vary from four thousand fifty-five hundred.

This question has only recently been brought to the attention of the trade again. The exhibitor, we are told, wants to know the exact length of his feature to guide him in booking the rest of his program. Obviously, if he used the same length short subjects to supplement a short five-reeler as he does for a feature that runs the full five thousand feet, his shows would never begin or finish at the same time, and like as not at the end of the day he would find himself forced to run another show to fill out his stipulated time.

The producers are rather loath to take the exhibitor into their confidence regarding this matter it seems, or else they have given it scant attention. Whether or not they believe it would work to their benefit is beside the point. Exhibitors know the length of the picture when they return it, and no howl has ever arisen over rental prices because of this—so they might just as well know beforehand.

One alternative of merely saying five or six "reels" has been for the reviewer to print the running time of the feature. But this method has proven of little value. Projecting room operators have no standard speed. Sometimes they run at theatre speed and often several minutes faster. One reel is sometimes sent through the machine quickly and the next slowly. So, of course, the running time as judged by the projecting room is about as inaccurate as the method now generally used in judging the length of features. It is to be hoped that the producers will come to this way of looking at the question. In England, where they sell by the number of feet, the practice has always been in vogue. A glance through any of the British trade journals will show it. They even go so far as to bring the length down to its actual measurement. Of course, such an extreme is not altogether necessary, but at least the American producer might be led to refer to the length of his product in round numbers instead of "reels" and "parts," terms so indefinite that they might as well be left out of reviews and advertising altogether.

The motion picture director who has served under D. W. Griffith long enough to learn the ways of his directing on the surface, but who has not made a serious study of his methods to learn the motives which lead to these directorial touches, is in the same class with the imitator of the popular star, regarding which reference was made here recently. Probably the most obvious of all the blunders made by the men who seek to emulate the wonderful work of Griffith is their introduction of comedy, chiefly through the medium of domestic animals, when they are forced to stop the action of their story to do so. Griffith's comedy is spontaneous, incidental—it seems to have been inspired at the moment and runs in as part of the main action. The comedy of the army of directors who "worked with Griffith," while perhaps inspired at the moment, rises not from the situations of the story but from the contemplative mind of the director himself. This is the general rule, at any rate. There are exceptions, of course, and notable ones, too, but that all powerful motif of "comedy-relief" often gets the better of the director's judgment and results in a product that is so unbalanced that much of the illusion is destroyed. In fact, comedy relief is a difficult element to gain. It should always be purely incidental, unforced, arising naturally from some major situation, and so creating the desired contrast. When it is obviously sought after and introduced without regard for its suitability it is not comedy-relief but comedy-out-of place.

George M. Cohan once waved the American flag and everyone in the house cheered; some director once took a close-up of a baby and established a precedent as popular as that introduced by the Indian when he discovered tobacco was the correct article for peace meetings. Really one can seldom wander into a theatre these days without seeing a close-up of a squirming infant. Most audiences take these shots good-naturedly, probably because a baby when sufficiently quiet is never to be taken otherwise. But the baby close-up has been used so often without due cause that it is becoming conventional and as a consequence rather a poor thing to employ in telling a story or developing a drama on the screen. Whenever a baby is called for in the scenario, nine out of ten directors cannot refrain from introducing the close-up, if for no other reason than to make the theatre rumble with "ohs" and "ahs" and expressions of appreciation. Infants have innocently put more than one weak situation over, but they have also interrupted more than one nicely running story, merely to gain a good but totally unnecessary effect.

"The Hired Man"

(Paramount-Ince—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

THIS is Charles Ray's latest picture and it takes a big stride beyond his previous effort, "His Mother's Boy." It introduces him as Ezry, an ambitious farm hand, who sacrifices his own rosy prospects to keep the brother of the girl he loves from jail. The part is not so much of the boob type as was his last. Of the farm hand he makes a thoroughly human character, tempering it with a mild degree of bashfulness that makes one sit back in his chair and chuckle. The story was written by Julien Josephson, and along with its comedy and romance offers several situations the suspense and human-interest value of which is unusually high.

Victor Schertzinger has given it a production that fairly teems with atmosphere. The country fair scenes are real, first and last. It is here that Ezry, in abbreviated overalls, wins the hurdle race against a field of trained contestants. The shots taken on the farm are typical in every degree and the fire scene at the end works in a good thrill before the happy ending brings the picture to a close. In the matter of photography "The Hired Man" is excellent.

Doris Lee, seen in Mr. Ray's last picture, gives a delightful interpretation of the role of Ruth Endicott. Charles French as the farmer is another human character and Gilbert Gordon as the weakling son, Lydia Knott and Carl Ullman complete a well selected cast of principals.

"The Hired Man" shows Charles Ray at his best in a vehicle, which alternately amuses and touches and which, as a consequence, makes ideal entertainment.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Ezry Hollins (Charles Ray), hired man on the farm of Caleb Endicott (Charles French), studies to enter the State Agricultural School and is assisted in his lessons by Ruth Endicott (Doris Lee), who greatly admires his ambition. On the day of his departure for the State center he stops off at the town bank to bid goodbye to Walter (Gilbert Gordon), his employer's son, who has embezzled bank funds amounting to five hundred dollars. Walter begs for help and Ezry, after a great struggle, turns over to him that amount—the whole of his tuition fee. He returns to the farm without a word and refuses all requests for an explanation. Ruth scorns him for a time, but later resumes her interest as he is so good-natured. She goes so far as to remain home from a harvest dance to cheer him up. When her suitor (Carl Ullman), son of the owner of the bank, appears and sees her teaching Ezry dancing steps he distorts the facts to Endicott. As a result Ezry is discharged that night. Early next morning he goes on his way, but a last look at the farm house shows him that it is afire. Walter, having come in late, much the worse for wear, is responsible. Ezry proves the hero, rouses the family and rescues Walter from his room. Walter, realizing the injustice he has done Ezry, confesses all to his family and naturally Ezry stays on the farm, and joins the Endicott family besides.

"The Studio Girl"

(Select—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

THIS romantic comedy-drama, adapted from the French by Paul West, gives Constance Talmadge a fitting part. She is seen as Celia Laird, a young girl with an artistic temperament, who finds life with her two maiden aunts in a simple sea coast town extremely dull and uninteresting. When an artist from the city appears for a rest her life receives a certain stimulus and while he is there she is happy. The manner in which she forces him to take her away with him and how finally they are married after the artist discovers the hypocrisy of his fiancee, puts a briskly humorous finish on a picture that has entertained from the very outset.

Extremely fragile in plot and depending on a number of situations more French than American, much of the burden of creating interest falls on the shoulders of Miss Talmadge. She rises to every situation with a sincerity and ease that is admirable. And so well does she characterize Celia Laird that anything offensive that might have found its way into the picture because of the risque situations is altogether precluded. Miss Talmadge is so real, so spirited, so full of youth and the mere joy of living that she is able to put all suggestions of sex appeal to rout. And, as in "Scandal," if she had allowed this suggestion to tint her performance in the slightest degree, "The Studio Girl" would not be the thoroughly enjoyable thing it is.

Earle Foxe opposite the star gives a good performance. Johnny Hines as Obed Daw, her small town suitor, contributes much to the comedy of the picture, as do Isabel O'Madigan and Grace Barton, who are seen as the maiden aunts. Edna Earle, Fred Tidmarsh and Gertrude Norman complete the cast. Charles Giblyn's direction is in every way adequate. The picture is based on "La Gamine," by P. Veber and H. de Gorsse.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Celia Laird (Constance Talmadge), lives with her maiden aunts (Isabel O'Madigan and Grace Barton) in the sea coast town of Cliff Haven. When Frazer Ordway (Earle Foxe), an artist, comes to the town for a rest, her life is brightened. In posing for Frazer she grows intimate with him and begs him to take her away from Cliff Haven before she is forced into a marriage with Obed Daw (Johnny Hines). He refuses, being affianced to Adriana Peroni (Edna Earle), and having certain qualms of conscience about taking a girl to the city unchaperoned. A foolish scandal is set moving in the town because of the companionship that has sprung up between the two, so Frazer makes his plans to leave. A desire for justice leads him to Celia's home, where he denounces the two old maids as hypocrites. While he is thus engaged Celia, in wedding gown, secrets herself in the tonneau of his car, and he is well on the road to the city before he discovers her presence. He insists on her going back, and puts her on a train, but the train leads to the city, and when Frazer arrives at his home after dining with his fiancee, he discovers that Celia is his guest. He spends the night with Dr. Grierson (Fred Tidmarsh), who learns the story. The next morning the doctor, jealous, tells Adriana of Celia's presence and she denounces Frazer. The aunts learn of their niece's whereabouts and arrive at Frazer's apartment with the police, but they are greeted by Mr. and Mrs. Frazer, off for their honeymoon, and are obliged to return to Cliff Haven with no bride for Obed Daw.

"Morok"

(Hesperia Films—Seven Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

ADAPTED from a section of Eugene Sue's well-known work, "The Wandering Jew," "Morok" has the essentials of good picture melodrama without the polish or even the least coherent finish with which the producer of America completes his melodrama. "Morok" was made in France, and its chief merit is that in selected locations and settings it is successful in bringing out the atmosphere of the original work. Time and again have sections of the French countryside and ancient quarters of Paris served the director to wonderful advantage by providing him with a background for his action as realistic as it is picturesque. Their full value is always apparent for, though the cameraman has seldom bothered to move his machine to gain special effects, the photography is of that same excellent variety that we usually associate with the picture bearing a foreign brand.

But the merit of "Morok's" setting does not extend further. It requires lengthy exposition in the way to subtitles to acquaint the spectator with the various characters and their relationship and at the same time this forecasts the whole gist of the melodrama. The logical end of the picture comes with the fifth reel, when Dagobert and his wards finally triumph over the vile schemes of D'Aurigny and Rodin of the Secret Company and arrive to secure their rightful fortune. The last two reels are virtually an anti-climax, inasmuch as all the contending begins over again, winding up with a conclusion identical with that of the fifth reel. Extensive editing and re-subtitling would make fairer entertainment of "Morok." Editing because of the anti-climax and new subtitling because those now in the picture are written with so much emphasis on their explanatory side that they, too, forecast the action to a great degree.

The director of "Morok" had more appreciation for the artistry of his scenes than he did of their dramatic worth. The utter gullibility of Rose and Bianca, the wards of old Dagobert, takes on humorous proportions as the story unfolds, instead of arousing the suspense of the spectator as should rightfully be the case. Again this fault can be laid to too much repetition. While a real ship and a real theatre were used in the wrecking and fire scenes, the effect produced is not one of realism. A scene which should never have been shot is the short flash of a tiger clawing and chewing a horse to death.

The actor who takes the role of Dagobert is by all odds the best in the cast. The remaining players are sincere, but in most cases they are either guilty of over-acting or not acting enough.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

According to a peculiar will the heirs of the Rennepont fortune are to hear the reading of their ancestor's will on the thirteenth of February in a Paris shop owned by descendents of the Jewish servant of the first Rennepont. Providing no heirs appear the fortune is to revert to the Secret Company, a greedy organization that masks as a virtuous religious body. D'Aurigny, its president, attempts to prevent the heirs from reaching their destination at the appointed time. Two of them, Rosa and Bianca, under the guardianship of Dagobert, an old soldier, set out to Paris from a rural town. Morok, an animal trainer, is commissioned by D'Aurigny to hinder their progress. This he does, first by setting his tiger on Dagobert's horse and later causing the arrest of the old soldier for attempting to enter Paris bearing firearms. The girls are imprisoned in a secluded house. Prince Jalma, another heir, en route to Paris aboard ship is attacked by his servant, a member of the Secret Order. This attempt on his life failing, the ship is sunk but the Prince escapes. His fiancee is detained in a home for the feeble-minded. On the eve of February thirteenth, D'Aurigny presents himself and demands the fortune. Only a codicil to the will prevents him from securing it. The codicil gives a month's postponement. Rodin, D'Aurigny's secretary, is then made president. His plans are better laid than D'Aurigny's, but even from these the harassed heirs finally escape in time to defeat the purpose of the Secret Company.

"Limousine Life"

(Triangle—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

IDA M. EVANS, author of "Limousine Life" in its original form of short story as it appeared in the Red Book, took for her central figure the "innocent country girl." But, flying in the face of tradition, convention and novelists in general, Miss Evans has drawn this central figure as considerably wiser than her sisters of fiction. In fact, the country girl, though innocent enough, is about as sophisticated as the customary smart girl on Broadway. At any rate the tables are turned and instead of the wicked city man sending her back to her parents sadder but wiser, she sends him back to his mother very much so.

This made thoroughly enjoyable reading as a story, but as transferred to the screen it falls below the stride it struck as originally presented It is some time before the observer is permitted to grasp the idea of the author and even then its subtleties of situation and its satire fail to take effect with that definiteness that pleases Olive Thomas is seen in the principal role, but aside from a charming smile and a pleasing appearance, has little to lend it in the way of characterization She is the playful salamander but fails to introduce any finer feeling in her part In a word she plays it as straight comedy when she should have handled it with some sense of its under-coverings of satire.

As the story relies wholly on this idea of the author's one tires of "Limousine Life" before the meridian of the reelage is attained. There is some comedy offered, but very little, even less than in Miss Thomas's last picture, and the results are not very satisfactory. Jack Cunningham prepared the scenario and Jack Dillon directed.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Minnie Wills (Olive Thomas) runs away from the farm to snatch a taste of city life in Chicago under the tutelage of Mrs. Malvin (Lottie De Vaulle), keeper of a moderate boarding-house. She secures employment in a fashionable gown shop, and meets Moncure Kelts (Lee Phelps), man-about-town, who is immediately attracted by her. One of the other shop girls (Lillian West), who has lived and learned, warns Minnie against him, but heedless of this she accepts his attentions. She indulges in the gentle pastime of "kidding" Kelts along, all the while keeping him at his proper distance. When he is finally forced to propose to her in front of his mother, he offers her a sum of money to depart, which Minnie accepts, returning to her country sweetheart, Jed (Joe Bennett) with a pocket full of money, and a wise little head to help him along in business.

Virginia Foltz, Harry Rattenberry, Alberta Lee, Lillian Langdon and Jules Friquet take the other named parts.

"The Widow's Might"

(Lasky-Paramount—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

JULIAN ELTINGE again doing the female impersonation act, so peculiarly adapted to comedy, is responsible for the success of "The Widow's Might," a five reel offering light and altogether lacking in dramatic suspense, but humorous time and again. The moment the star appears a la Westerner and learns from his pals that Horace Hammer has put over a land-grabbing scheme before their very unsuspicious noses, it doesn't take a great stretch of the imagination to foretell the ultimate outcome of the story. You have a sneaking idea that Dick Tavish (Mr. Eltinge) is going to don feminine regalia and beat H. H. at his own game and win a wife for himself besides.

All of which he does. But the picture has been saved from being merely the uninteresting development to a foregone conclusion by the introduction of the wealth of humorous situations arising from the complications in which Dick finds himself after donning his finery. A stray baby also finds its way into the story and is considered to be Princess Martini's (this lady being Dick). Much comedy is caused by this little codger also. The humor is quite broad and finds its way to the audience chiefly through the subtitles. It registers well too, and immediate flashes of the smiling, innocent infant serve to remove utterly the suggestion of anything offensive.

Indeed, it is the excellent production, and, of course, Mr. Eltinge, that makes "The Widow's Might" the fine piece of comedy it is. Lacking in plot and with a number of situations that demanded the most delicate kind of handling, less subtle, less artistic direction would have turned out an uninteresting and crude product. As it is the picture can be well recommended for all varieties of houses. Mr. Eltinge's novelty is still such to the screen and his talents in his particular line cannot be overestimated. He handles his various changes of character with skill and poise. Florence Vidor is a charming heroine. Gustave Von Seyffertitz is sure in every expression, every gesture as the Horrible Horace Hammer, and Mayme Kelso and James Neill have comedy roles which they carry easily.

Marion Fairfax prepared the vehicle and William C. De Mille directed.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Ranch-owners discover that they have been swindled by Horace Hammer (Gustave Von Seyffertitz) and appoint Dick Tavish (Julian Eltinge) and Red (James Neill) to visit him and demand reparation. Dick welcomes the opportunity because it gives him the chance to be near Irene Stuart (Florence Vidor), a girl whose picture he has always admired. Hammer laughs at Dick's threat so he decides to go through his papers. While burglarizing the safe Hammer enters and Dick is forced to take flight by the fire escape. Surrounded, he finds refuge in the room of Mrs. Pomeroy Pomfret (Mayme Kelso), who is engaged in trying on a new wig. This gives Dick the big idea. He seizes the wig and cloak and so throws his pursuers off the track. The subsequent incidents include Dick's triumph over Hammer in his disguise, his winning of Irene, to say nothing of the various complications his escapade leads him through.

"The Grain of Dust"

(Crest Pictures—Six Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

BASED on David Graham Phillips' story, which originally ran in the Saturday Evening Post, "The Grain of Dust" is an unusually strong picture. And this, in face of the fact that the story offered few possibilities to the adaptor, save for its single big situation, should bring a large share of credit to the producers. Its central characters are a powerful man in the business world, a human machine, in whom all finer emotions are buried by his ambition and lust for power, and the Grain of Dust, a stenographer in his office. She works a spell over the man of business, quite unintentionally, but so powerful in its effect that he forsakes his pursuit of fame and fortune for her. He offers her love, wealth—everything but his name, and she spurns him. The man breaks with the refusal and only settles down to his work again when the Grain of Dust has for the time passed from his life. But, so great has been the lesson, that when they next meet he offers her honorable love and marriage.

It can be seen from this slight outline of the plot that the strength of "The Grain of Dust" results from the clashing of the two widely different characters. And to gain dramatic power from this clash and hold it throughout six reels must have been no easy task. Happily, though, with the skilful direction of Harry Revier, this has been accomplished. Careful and original handling on the part of Mr. Revier have worked wonders with a situation that might have remained colorless under less capable handling. Even in the straight scenes he has succeeded in bringing out the full force of Mr. Phillips' story—there remains something weirdly fascinating about it all that constantly keeps the attention.

Lillian Walker is featured in the title part, and gives a performance that is sincere at least and generally effective. The big part of "The Grain of Dust," however, is that of the business man, Frederick Norman, a part exceptionally well acted by Ramsey Wallace, an actor new to the screen. Ralph Delmore is a good type for the fighting capitalist, Edith Day succeeds as Norman's fiancee and James O'Neill, Corene Uzzell and Richard Wangerman give good performances. Jacques Tyrol, Cecil Fletcher and Elizabeth Ferris complete the cast.

Mr. Revier's settings are always in keeping with the demands of the story. Particularly does the Wall street office of Norman catch the eye for its elaborateness. The film has been expertly edited and supplied with a set of subtitles that could not be bettered.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Frederick Norman (Ramsey Wallace), a power in "The Street," works along like a well oiled machine until Dorothy Hallowell (Lillian Walker), a stenographer in the office, attracts his attention and proves to be the Grain of Dust which ruffles the order of his existence. Her father (Richard Wangerman), a feeble-minded experimenter, he sets up in a fine laboratory and promises Dorothy to finance his inventions. He places them in an elegant apartment, posing the while as a perfectly well-meaning protector. When he makes advances toward her she repulses him. Crazed with his desire for her, he even insults her the moment of her father's death. Tetlow (James O'Neill), rejected suitor of Dorothy's, acquaints Norman's fiancee, Josephine (Edith Day) with all this, with the result that he is forsaken by all his friends. He seeks to drown his sorrow in drink, while Dorothy makes a new start in a country town. But her innocent past rises up to damn her among her new associates, and she journeys to the city again. Disheartened, she accepts the attentions of Prince Boris (Jacques Tyrol), but, disgusted with him at the last moment, she flees from him. Her course leads her to the river, and it is here that Norman, recovered after a physical and mental breakdown and on the road to financial success again, finds her. She returns to his home, where under the care of Norman's housekeeper she regains her spirits and realizing the change in Norman accepts him.

"Out West"

(Paramount—Two Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

IN "Out West" Fatty Arbuckle offers a burlesque on the Western melodrama that possesses many laughable features. William S. Hart is the main target of Arbuckle's comedy. For instance, he rolls a cigarette in one hand with miraculous ease and rapidity, volunteers to reform for the sake of a Salvation Army lassie and proceeds to rescue her at the last moment from the villain, Heartless Bill, by tickling him to unconsciousness. These points and additional clever burlesque on the "typical" barroom scene make for the general good of the comedy.

But while "Out West" is good when it comes to Arbuckle and his immediate support, consisting of Buster Keaton, Al St. John and Alice Lake, it becomes noticeably slack when these people recede from the foreground. The long shots of furious fighting possess no comedy value and are quite out of place, while Arbuckle as director has shown a marked tendency to cater directly to Arbuckle as star, sometimes to the detriment of the incidental action of the scene. However, "Out West" hands out a good supply of laughs and Fatty's popularity is never to be taken lightly.

"The Hopper"

(Triangle—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

MEREDITH NICHOLSON'S name on a story is generally a guarantee of originality, of novel situations and surprises, and "The Hopper" is not to be excepted from the rule. He has fashioned a most pleasing comedy-drama and toward the end a line of action that brings unusual suspense and many more laughs is introduced At the beginning he introduces two sets of characters, in station and action remotely removed from one another. Just how he will bring them together and work to a concise conclusion is something of a mystery. But he does it and cleverly with the result that "The Hopper" winds up in a burst of surprises and comedy that leaves an excellent impression.

As is the case in whatever picture he appears, George Hernandez scores a decided individual success in his interpretation of the humorously grouchy old Wilbur Talbot, antique collector. His early and later scenes when his hatred of his rival collector, Wilton, gets the better of him are exceptional in the way of comedy. Walt Whitman as the rival gives a dignified performance, touched with a likable degree of humor that registers well. The many scenes between these two old men are the brightest spots in the entire five reels of "The Hopper." There is the love story of their children and the line of action created by the three reformed crooks, which combined ultimately result in a closing of the antagonism on the part of the antique-collecting belligerents.

Jack Cunningham did Nicholson's story into scenario form much as Nicholson might have done it himself and Thomas Heffron finished the good work with a production that is satisfactory in every department. Good performances are contributed by Irene Hunt, William V. Mong, Lillian West, Louis Durham and a clever little boy who is forced to appear under the name of "Peaches" Jackson.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Because Talbot (George Hernandez) secures a Ming vase which he long coveted, Wilton (Walt Whitman) breaks his friendship with him. Their children (Irene Hunt and Eugene Corey), despite paternal warfare marry. Several years later young Talbot finds it hard to support his wife and boy (Peaches Jackson), but the two old men remain obdurate to all entreaties. The Hopper (William V. Mong), a reformed crook, his wife (Lillian West), and an old pal (Louis Durham) live on a farm near the Talbots. Returning from the city one evening, the Hopper believes a detective on his trail. He jumps into Roger Talbot's roadster standing by the curb, and takes flight for home. On the trip he discovers that the little boy is with him. He returns to young Talbot's home to make an inspection, and is held up by Mary. She forces him to steal the Ming vase from old Talbot, and a greatly coveted object from Wilton. These losses almost bring the old men to blows, but when the Hopper appears with both the boy and the valuables all is settled amicably.

BEARING the sensational title of "Cogs of Death," this, the tenth episode of "The Hidden Hand" sees the Hidden Hand himself brought back to the land of the living by an electrical apparatus. After a considerable amount of feinting by both sides, Verda finally manages to lead Doris to a bridge over a railroad track, where she is surrounded by agents of the Hidden Hand. A freight train is passing below and this offers the only means of escape. She makes the leap and lands in a car of coal. The car is switched to a siding and Doris is dumped into a coal bucket which revolves on an endless chain. Unconscious, she is in danger of being ground to death by the cogs which turn the bucket-chain, when the episode closes.

"The Other Woman"

(Pathe—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

THIS presentation of the most conventional of all the "eternal triangle" i. e., the married couple and the other woman, is lacking in characterization, too swiftly developed to bring out whatever dramatic situations the plot framework may have possessed, and shows the persons of the triangle entering upon situations which are poorly motivated as far as the mere spectator is concerned. Philip Bartholomae prepared the scenario from a story of Frederick Arnold Kummer's, a writer of ability. It is evident that Mr. Bartholomae's adaptation is chiefly at fault. He has plunged into the vitals of the action right at the start and the rate at which he proceeds to first entangle in and then unravel his characters from the usual situation gives the impression that he must have been turning out a rush order. This is such an unusual point to make in a day of padded five reelers that it may sound hypercritical. But indeed Mr. Bartholomae seems to have jumped to the other and no more praiseworthy extreme in preparing the Kummer plot for screen use.

Peggy Hyland is featured in the title part and, more or less unfortunately, shares the spotlight of sympathy along with the husband. Anna Lehr's portrayal of Mrs. Harrington is exceptionally well played but entirely without appeal despite the ability of the actress. Again this seems to be the scenario writer's fault. As Harrington eventually returns to his wife, it would have been better had he sketched in the character as possessing more of an appeal. Miss Hyland is radiantly pretty as Eleanor, the girl who makes a success at painting in New York, assumes a Greenwich Village outlook on life, only to be rudely shaken from these ideas by those of the world in general. Milton Sills as a very human husband gets the most from his role.

"The Other Woman" has been very well put on by Albert Parker. Settings and scenes are ever in good taste and the photographic work of the best.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Eleanor (Peggy Hyland), a successful artist, meets Harrington (Milton Sills), a man from her own town. His wife (Anna Lehr) has no interests other than those in her very household, and Harrington, tired of aimless evenings at home, turns to Eleanor for sympathy. The sympathy soon develops into love, and, with the death of the Harrington baby, the man sees less and less of his wife. Mrs. Harrington broods over her lost child, and finally, unacquainted with the identity of her husband's new love, appeals to Eleanor to paint a miniature of the baby. She pours out her whole sad story to Eleanor, who listens in horror, realizing it is she who has caused all the woe. Harrington departs for the West on business. His wife learns that Eleanor is the other woman and denounces her. Eleanor gives her a lecture on the proper treatment of husbands in return, and Mrs. Harrington comes to a realization of her own shortcomings. And though she may have Harrington for the mere asking; Eleanor, awakened to a sense of the wrong of such an act, sends him back to his wife.

"The Divine Sacrifice"

(World Film—Five Reels)

Reviewed by Peter Milne

KITTY GORDON is not the type to portray women in which the maternal instinct is the dominating characteristic, but whoever selects her screen vehicles for her seems to hold that she is. "The Divine Sacrifice" gives her as Madeline Spencer, another such part. The story, adapted from a piece of fiction bearing the authorship of Alma Speer Benzing, centers about the child-loving Madeline with a plot in which a marriage grown loveless and rather peculiar ideas on morality and propriety are the chief ingredients. The divine sacrifice is made by Madeline, who after living with Dr. Carewe for over eighteen years as his wife and having borne him a daughter, turns the girl over to the doctor's real wife that she may go to the altar and exchange a real name for her husband's. How it was that the daughter didn't learn of her parents' illegal relations is never explained. And, in the face of this, it is not reasonable for Madeline to make her divine sacrifice. In fact, after the eighteen years have passed, the story quite fails to convince because of its all too apparent disregard of fact.

Miss Gordon, beautifully gowned as usual, does not express either the passionate love or the calm sacrifice demanded of her in any realistic measure. Neither do the eighteen years make any perceptible change in her appearance, a fault of either star or director that will certainly be caught by the great majority of picture goers. It is of interest that Vera Beresford, Kitty Gordon's daughter, appears in the cast as June Carewe. Jean Angelo as the doctor is too stiff and camera-conscious to be a lifelike figure. George Archainbaud directed.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Because of his wife's refusal to bear him a child, Dr. David Carewe (Jean Angelo) slowly drifts away from her and devotes himself to work in his children's hospital. Here he comes in contact with Madeline Spencer (Kitty Gordon), a married woman, suffering the same sort of a life. Mrs. Carewe (Celene Johnson) leaves for Europe on the same boat as Rupert Spencer (Frank Goldsmith), Madeline's husband. By a coincidence they are both entrapped in a fire in Egypt and reported killed. Believing they are free, Madeline and Carewe are married. Later they are astounded at the return of Mrs. Carewe. Though the marriage is made void, Madeline lives on with Carewe until her daughter, June (Vera Beresford) reaches her eighteenth birthday, at which time she falls in love with Robert Spencer (Harry Fraser), son of Madeline's dead husband by a former wife. So that June may go to him with untainted name, Madeline tells June that she is merely her guardian—that her real mother is Mrs. Carewe.

"A Heart's Revenge"

(Fox—Five Reels)

"A HEART'S REVENGE," featuring Sonia Markova, is melodrama. Rough melodrama. A glance at the name of the author, George Scarborough, might lead one to believe that the product would be a little more polished with a few of its corners smoothed off for effect, but evidently Mr. Scarborough wrote on a formula and for sensational effects before anything else. Of these "A Heart's Revenge" has aplenty. Witness the chief characters: Vera, Jim Harding, of the U. S. Aviation, and Baron Eugene Drako, villainous. With the internals of this Triangle set in motion a large amount of action results. The Baron has a fluid given him by a Chinaman that will make a man forgetful and cause him to lose all will power. So it is administered to Jim because Vera has accepted him. And then the Baron sets out to win Vera for himself, but fails dolefully. Vera is suspicious, forces the Baron's hand and in a wild motor boat chase overtakes the ship on which Jim is shanghaied.

This is what might be termed "typical" melodrama, and it is presented in like style. Oscar A. C. Lund was in charge of the direction and missed no trick passed him by the author. Miss Markova, or Mme. if you will, is an attractive leading woman, and David Herblin as hero and Frank Goldsmith as villain are active in their efforts to make "A Heart's Revenge" a success.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Seeing his rival, Jim Harding (David Herblin) successful in winning the love of Vera Sabouroff (Sonia Markova), Baron Drako (Frank Goldsmith) administers a poisonous potion to him and shanghaies him on a steamer bound for China. The poison works on the brain cells, deadening all initiative and making the man fretful. The Baron then attempts to win Vera for himself, but, suspicious, she proceeds to fathom the Baron's vile scheme and, by a ruse, succeeds in forcing a confession of the plot from him. After a thrilling chase she rescues Jim, while a blow on the head restores him to his right mind.

"His Hidden Purpose"

THE famous Mack Sennett butting ram and various kinds of trick work made "His Hidden Purpose" another riot of fun. Chester Conklin and Marie Prevost are the featured players, Conklin in his usual funny make-up and Marie in various stages of deshabille. The ram is introduced right at the start and butts into the story, completely obliterating all signs of plot. The film winds up with a chase, but not one of the usual variety. There are the two automobiles and the motorcycle, but the chase is through the pouring rain. This lends divers additional opportunities for originality in the way of gags, which Directors Eddie Cline and Clarence Badger have utilized with uproarious results.

Gene Rogers, Neal Burns and Frank Cooper complete the cast. "His Hidden Purpose" will lend the right amount of comedy to any bill, although it seems shorter than the usual run of Mack Sennett's.

"Woman and Wife"

ALICE BRADY gives one of her best impersonations in the late Select Picture, titled "Woman and Wife," adapted from Charlotte Bronte's famous novel, "Jane Eyre." The production was directed by Edward Jose. In the first reels Miss Brady is seen in the role of a young girl whose unruly temper has compelled her relatives to send her to a reform school. In the latter reels she appears as the governess in the home of a wealthy Englishman whom she later marries.

"Woman and Wife" is not the best work that Miss Brady has done for the screen, but it will stand as one of her best. The story is one that holds the interest and the character of the role permits the star to present two distinct types. Much of the story calls for deep emotion, and Miss Brady rises to dramatic heights in every scene which calls for such registration.

Edward Jose has spared nothing in giving this picture the true atmosphere as suggested by the author's work. Some of the sets used are lavish in every detail and the exteriors are examples of the beautiful. The original title would seem to be the stronger of the two. "Woman and Wife" conveys nothing to the minds of the audience whereas "Jane Eyre" is recognized as the work of an artist.

The members of the supporting cast are entitled to special notice for the convincing work which they do in this production. Eliott Dexter, playing opposite Miss Brady in the principal male role, gives an exhibition that defies adverse criticism. Mr. Dexter's work before the camera is commendable and especially so in this production. Helen Green, Helen Lindroth, Victor Benoit and Lenora Morgan are seen to fine advantage. Lenora Morgan in a character role does Class A work. She has a difficult role to present—that of a half-crazed girl whose mind has been deranged by drink—and her characterization is most praiseworthy. The photography is up-to-the-minute.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Jane Eyre (Alice Brady), lives with relatives who have taken a dislike to her. On the slightest pretense, they sent her to a reform school, where she is kept until she has arrived at womanhood. Her true character is discovered at the institution, and she is loved by all.

Edward Rochester (Eliott Dexter), a wealthy Englishman, who has married unwisely, Valerie (Lenora Morgan), who is addicted to drink, and becomes mentally deranged. After a child is born, Rochester learns the truth and leaves his wife in the care of her mother and brother. He advertises for a governess, and Jane applies for the position. She is accepted. Rochester, believing that his wife had died, proposes to Jane, and their engagement is announced. Valerie's brother, Roul (Victor Benoit), hears of the announcement, and determines to blackmail Rochester. He brings Valerie, heavily veiled, to the Rochester home while Ruth is out, and presents her to her husband. Rochester is dumbfounded, for he thinks her dead. He confines her in a secluded room of the house, and when Jane returns he requests that the marriage be postponed. During the night Valerie escapes from the room, and seeks to kill Rochester. She awakens Jane, who sees her enter Rochester's room. Jane finds Rochester stabbed, and Rochester explains that it was done by a burglar. The wedding day arrives, and as the ceremony is about to be performed, Valerie arrives on the scene, and the truth is disclosed.

Jane is about to leave when news is brought that Valerie who has escaped has been drowned. Rochester explains all, and they are happily married.

"The Eagle's Eye," Three Episodes

(Wharton, Inc.—Two Reels Each)

Reviewed by Joseph L. Kelley

WILLIAM J. FLYNN'S serial story, as produced by Wharton Brothers, if the first three episodes can be accepted as a criterion for the quality of the serial as a whole, is one that will hold the interest of every American and one that stands up to the end of each episode in its revelation of German intrigue in America. It is a series rather than a serial, for each episode unfolds a distinct incident in the plans of the Germany spies operating in this country. The incidents as related are founded upon fact as furnished by William J. Flynn, former Chief of the United States Secret Service.

The first three episodes were shown for review at the Strand theatre, New York. The first episode reveals the important facts incident to the German plot to torpedo the Lusitania. It is titled "The Hidden Death." The second episode discloses the activities of the German spies in attempting to dynamite the Ansonia Hotel during the Naval Ball, held at the time of the naval review in New York harbor. It is titled "The Naval Ball Conspiracy." The third episode discloses the incident which happened prior to the departure of the Atlantic fleet from New York harbor and the attempts made by German conspirators to blow up the fleet.

"The Eagle's Eye" should be a strong box-office attraction and one that will play to crowded houses whether it be in the small town or big city. All are interested in a disclosure of the facts relating to the activities of the German spies in the United States. One who sees the first episode will not miss the ones that are to follow. It is not alone a strong dramatic presentation on the screen but it carries a certain degree of sensationalism which spells success at the box-office. The German characters, von Bernstroff, von Papen and Dr. Albert, the three principals who worked in the interest of German intrigue in America, are presented by screen artists whose types closely resemble those of the German conspirators they represent. Every flash on the screen discloses some incident, based on facts submitted by ex-Chief Flynn, which spell adventure and thrill with every action registered.

King Baggot is the hero and presents the role of Harrison Grant, president of the Criminology Club, with fine appreciation for the more subtle mystery element. He has grasped the idea with both hands and hits the high spots in his dramatic portrayal of this character. Marguerite Snow, who has the principal feminine part, registers in every scene in which she appears. Miss Snow makes an ideal woman detective, and in the role of Dixie Mason, who has volunteered to assist the United States Secret Service, she executes her part with the deftness of a feminine Sherlock Holmes. Bertram Marburgh, John Wade, Frederick Jones and Paul Everton give a good account of the treachery of the Germans. Florence Short does her usual good work in the heavy character woman's role.

The photography is, in spots, a bit shady, especially noticeable in the scenes taken in the ball room of the Ansonia Hotel. The direction is due special praise. In a number of the scenes Chief Flynn appears. "The Eagle's Eye" should be considered by every exhibitor as a strong, box-office attraction. It will get the crowds and give the utmost satisfaction.

"Little Red Riding Hood"

"LITTLE RED RIDING HOOD" is a picturization of another of those bedside stories that children, and especially the very little tots, have loved to hear from time immemorial. And no mother can give her kiddies more of a treat than to take them to see the pictorial version of this fairy tale. Produced by the Wholesome Film Company and directed by Otis B. Thayer, the current release of this progressive mail order film company stamps it as a concern that most certainly intends to get in solid with the coming generation.

Although a child's picture first, last and all the time, devoid of complicated plot, without the vampire or the girl who has gone astray, and stands the different twists that can be put on the eternal triangle, there is something in this Wholesome story, with its faithful depiction of the innocence of childhood play and the things that occupy the juvenile imagination, that cannot help but be refreshing even to grown ups.

In some of the scenes as many as three hundred and fifty children appear on the screen, and their acting, although at times just a trifle stiff, is on the whole the natural, unaffected kind that affords such a relief from the camera consciousness of adults. The photography throughout is noticeably clear and fine.

The first three reels of the picture deal with a children's Christmas party so that the tale of Little Red Riding Hood and the wolf doesn't appear until near the end. After the guests have all gone home and the two little girls have gone to bed, the "dream angel," seated on the hook of the moon, takes control of their destinies, and one after another bits from well known fairy tales float through their minds. The circus scenes and the bright piece of fantasy where the little folks dance on a revolving phonograph disc are a treat in themselves, and well worth the price of admission to any picture house.

Exhibitors who run a special children's matinee or have a regular night for children will find "Little Red Riding Hood" an attraction that will find high favor among their juvenile patronage.

"Fields of Honor"

(Goldwyn—Five Reels)

MAE MARSH in a screen version of Irving S. Cobb's story of the same name, is stronger, more forcible and more convincing than the story itself. The author has opened with a bang but as he gets along in his story, he has resorted to the almost fanciful in order to preserve its continuity and arrive at the predestined conclusion. He has, however, written a typical Mae Marsh story and one in which she finds a wide field to display her still wider scope for versatility in action and impersonation. She endows the story with a certain strength of presentment which in the hands of other interpreters would fall flat.

"Fields of Honor," as a Mae Marsh picture, gets over. As a box-office attraction it ranks with the best and the exhibitors' receipts will prove this statement. There are many criticisms that could be made adverse to the story as a screen drama, but the fact that Miss Marsh is given such a characteristic role, sweeps all minor defects into the background. Ralph Ince, who directed, has given to the latter reels a real touch of war—war as it is waged in the night—and the lighting effects which have been obtained are wonders for their power to grip an audience and hold attention to every action that occurs during the showing of these scenes.

The improbable situations arise during the exposition of the heroine's adventures in America, are distinct drawbacks to the production considered as a perfect drama. Particularly the incident which discloses Marie looking for the charitable home. By a stretch of the imagination, one can picture such misfortunes as befall her in this search but unless the imagination is played upon, the average person can not reconcile the natural trend with the one which the author seeks to impress. The title, the author's fame and that of Director Ince, the war scenes and the name and work of Miss Marsh will put this picture over with any audience and leave in its wake a long list of thoroughly satisfied patrons.

Marguerite Marsh, Mae Marsh's sister, appears in one of the principal roles and does credit to the responsibility entrusted to her by Director Ince. George Cooper does his usual good work and for the first time leaves behind the role of the gangster and tough guy. Vernon Steele registers in the straight role. John Wessel, Neil Moran, Maud Cooling, Ned Hay and Ed Lynch are seen to good advantage. George Hill, at the camera, registers some clever photographic work.

There are a number of big scenes of the battles in Europe that are extremely vivid and which will afford the exhibitor a chance to advertise this picture in an effective manner. The fact that the story was written by a man who has been over the battlefield and has seen the armies in action should aid in the exploitation.

THE STORY AND PLAYERS

Marie (Mae Marsh) and Helen Mersereau (Marguerite Marsh), two little French girls, arrive in America with their brother Paul (George Cooper) and Helen's sweetheart Hans (John Wessel). Robert Vorhis, a young American artist returning from France, is attracted by Marie's quaint beauty and makes a sketch of her as she waits for the boat to dock.

In New York the little family engage a small flat and for a time they are happy. Marguerite is taken sick and confined to her bed. Paul works as a baker and Hans finds work in a store. Marie finds work in a florist shop. Robert, in search for flowers for his mother, stops at the florist shop and discovers his little friend, Marie. He asks her to come to his home so that he might finish the sketch which he had started on the boat. She consents and is introduced to Robert's father and mother.

In the meantime, Helen is growing worse. War is declared and Paul returns to France to join the colors. Hans returns to Germany to fight for the only country he knows. Marie is left alone with her sick sister. She finds it hard to make ends meet. Robert's cousin has invited Marie to dinner with him but she does not place trust in him. He tells Robert's father and mother that Marie has a bad character. Robert defends Marie and asks her to marry him. Robert is sent to California to forget. Marie becomes poverty stricken and her sister is near her death. The doctor advises Marie to take her sister to a home and Marie leaves in the night to find the address. She asks several men and is accused of soliciting. She is brought to court and faces Robert's father who is presiding as justice. A detective is sent to investigate Marie's home and he finds her sister dead. The judge is convinced that Marie is innocent. She is freed and prepares to leave for France. Robert returns and finds her as she is going aboard the steamer.

King Bee Tells of Success

Gives Spitzer Credit for Discovering Billy West and Nursing the Company to Financial Health—Now "Solid"

"NAT H. SPITZER, vice-president and sales manager of the King Bee Films Corporation," reads an announcement from the King Bee offices this week, "discovered Billy West and promoted the company that has made such headway that King Bee comedies are now exhibited in every country in the world excepting Germany, Austria and Russia.

"A great deal of the credit for the financial success of this company is due Mr. Spitzer, whose faith in the young comedian never wavered, and who has made good every promise regarding West's ability to make people laugh, when he made his trip to the state buyers throughout the United States.

"Mr. Spitzer started in the film game eleven years ago in the British Northwest. With the little money he saved he bought a Selig, Vitagraph and Edison three-reeler and went barn-storming out there, playing school rooms and town halls, charging 50 cents to $1.50 admission. The first show he gave he had to be his own operator, but for some reason the machine refused to work and he was forced to refund the money that came in. He traveled seventy-five miles to an expert operator with his machine and found that he had the lenses in the wrong way.

"By this method of showing pictures he made enough money to lease a picture house in Seattle, which has been remodeled from a store, seating 300 people. It did not take long before he had his picture theatre playing to capacity, and sold out at a handsome profit to a local manager. He then became salesman for the Warner Feature Company. When the World Film opened their Kansas City office, Nat H. Spitzer was placed in charge. The results he obtained out there caused William Fox to make him general manager for the Fox interests in Canada. His next move was to establish offices all over the United States and Canada for Bluebird. It was while promoting the Bluebird brand of film that he saw Billy West in a vaudeville theatre and made a contract with him to go in films."

Pathe Looks After the Character Roles

DRAMATIC stories, artistic portrayals of character, and high-class productions make each of "The Price of Folly" high grade attractions for every class of exhibitor, according to an official of Pathe.

"Characterizations that put over the strength and weaknesses of humanity are features of these productions," said this Pathe official. "Each and every one of them have all the strength that an episode of a serial would have, while they are complete in themselves.

"Ruth Roland and Frank Mayo, who have been big box-office winners for exhibitors in other Pathe releases, are the featured members of the cast in these stories. Will M. Ritchey, responsible for many Pathe successes, is the author and he handles the themes he selected for treatment in his ablest manner.

"The frailties and foibles of human nature are shown on the screen. The bitter price some girls are forced to pay to achieve a career is the topic dealt with in "Phantom Fame," the first of the series. This two-reel drama is really a warning for girls and young wives, who have neither talent nor capacity to achieve success in a literary way, but are always thinking what they might do along this line, while neglecting the work that lies before them—work perhaps in which they would be more congenially situated and where their real efforts would be more appreciated.

"'What happens to the girl who flirts' is the theme of another chapter of the series, called 'Counterfeit Clues'."

Eight William Fox Features in February

ANNOUNCEMENT has been made by William Fox of the scheduling of eight productions for release during February. There will be two Standard Pictures, four Fox Special Features, and two Fox-Lehrman Sunshine Comedies.

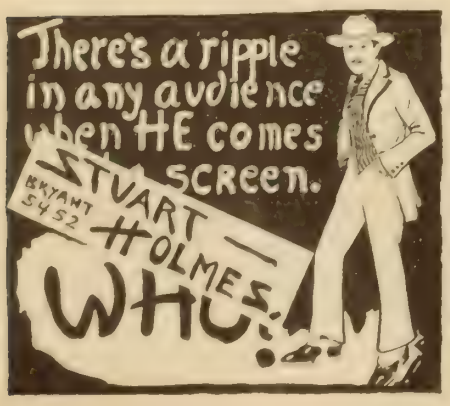
June Caprice and Henry Lehrman will provide the first releases, the former appearing in "The Heart of Romance," and Mr. Lehrman's comedy offering being "Hungry Lions in a Hospital." Both of these will be available to exhibitors February 3.

The second week of the month, beginning February 10, will be a big week from the standpoint of the Fox management. The Special Feature set down for this date is 'Jack Spurlock—Prodigal," in which George Walsh is featured.

The other release of this week, considered the most important which William Fox has made this year, is "Les Miserables," the William Farnum de luxe production, that has just finished a long run at the Lyric theatre in New York. This release created considerable surprise in the trade, due to previous announcements having led to the belief that the production would be retained for some time by the producer for road company service.

Gladys Brockwell will be seen in "The Moral Law" beginning February 17. This special feature gives the actress a double role, that of two half-sisters, and makes her both heroine and villainess. Another Sunshine Comedy also will be released this week. It is titled "Are Married Policemen Safe?" and was originally scheduled for January 13.

Jane and Katherine Lee have completed a new Standard Picture which will be offered to exhibitors February 24, but which is not yet named.



The Fox special feature for the week of February 24 will be "The Girl with the Champagne Eyes," a Western drama, in which Jewel Carmen is the star and in which she is said to shine luminously.

Surprises Aimed at by Director Tucker

"IN picturizing the story of 'Dodging a Million,'" said Goldwyn Pictures Corporation this week, "George Loane Tucker determined to aim for novelties. He shared Goldwyn's confidence in the story written by Edgar Selwyn and A. M. Kennedy ro the extent of trusting the narrative to take care of itself. But surprises in the settings, novelties of action and photographic punches, he decided would not take care of themselves.

"The scenario offered certain scope to the director's ability in this regard. He selected three episodes in the play capable of extensive development: the atelier of an exclusive creator of women's clothes, a theatre, and a skating cabaret. Each could have been treated conventionally, in the manner often seen on the screen. It was for this reason, more than any other, that Mr. Tucker resolved to make the shop, the theatre and the restaurant unlike any ever seen on the screen.

"In consultation with Hugo Ballin, art director for Goldwyn, models were prepared for these settings. The first, representing the modiste's shop, was elaborate in the extreme. For the theatre episode Mr. Tucker hit upon another device that stamps the new production as something entirely out of the ordinary. The hero, heroine and villain find themselves in a theatre where a gorgeous tale of the East is in progress against a background of Arabian Nights scenery and costumes. For the third surprise in 'Dodging a Million' a novel ice cabaret was devised, with real ice on which professional skaters go through sensational evolutions, and Miss Normand herself cuts fancy figures."

Reid's Next Picture Scheduled

Wallace Reid, who is at present appearing in "Rimrock Jones," will make his next screen appearance for Paramount in "The Thing We Love," with Kathlyn Williams.

It was with the production of this picture that Lou Tellegen returned to the field of directing photoplays.

Deer Creek to Have New Picture House

Deer Creek, Ill., has a population of only 500, but it is going to have a motion picture theatre which would be a credit to a city six times that size.

A theatre to cost $10,000 is now under construction and will be completed in the near future. J. M. Davis, a wealthy citizen of Deer Creek, and the manager of the only picture house there, is providing the new building which is to be thoroughly equipped with all modern conveniences. While this is under construction, Mr. Davis is using the Deer Creek opera house as the place for operating, but will discontinue there as soon as the new theatre is opened. His new equipment has all been purchased including one of the 1917 Motiographs and Nu-Movie Lites.

J. H. Magoon, of Honolulu, and Harold Bolster, of Goldwyn, Snapped on a Cruise

Big V Features a Rock Battle

A rock battle is said to be the feature of the current Big V Comedy featuring Larry Semon, also written and directed by him. After demolishing a building, built on the Vitagraph lot for the purpose, Semon and his followers hide behind a rock pile until they can no longer hide behind it, having thrown the rocks at their pursuers. Many black eyes resulted from the battle, it is said, and it was only a corrugated tin covering that protected the camera from the missiles. The story is "Stripes and Stumbles."

Winnipeg Exchanges Form Association

The exchange managers of Winnipeg have formed an Exchange Managers' Association. Luxurious quarters have been secured in the Kennedy Building, where regular meetings of the managers will be held every week.

Canada Theatres Dim Lobby Lights

Canadian exhibitors who formerly made a specialty of electric lobby displays, are now using other methods for dressing their lobbies. Starting January 15 no illuminated advertising and ornamental signs are allowed because of the need for power in manufacturing war material.

EXHIBITORS' PERSONALS

ARKANSAS.—F. B. Garrett has rented the building in the New South Inn Block, Clarendon, formerly occupied as a picture show, and will open a modern moving picture theatre within the next few days.

CALIFORNIA.—J. W. Bascom has rented the Opera House at Sisson, and is redecorating same and fitting it up for motion picture purposes.

The Strand theatre, San Francisco, was recently sold to M. L. Markowitz, manager of the California Film Exchange. The consideration is reported as a little over $100,000. Leo Weinberger, resident manager of the Strand, will retain his position with the new owner.

C. L. Langley, of San Francisco, has bought the T. and D. theatre at Hanford, and already assumed the active management of same.

IDAHO.—Martyn E. Mallory has secured a lease on the Hailey Opera House, Hailey, beginning about June 1. At the meeting of the Odd Fellows held recently, three bids were submitted. Brooks & Jackson, the present lessees, put in a bid for $100 per month rental; George D. Wheeler, $125 per month and Martyn E. Mallory, $125 per month.

It is presumed that Mr. Mallory will conduct a picture show in the building. Messrs. Brooks & Jackson are undecided as to whether they will sell out their show business or secure new quarters in which to conduct the same.

ILLINOIS.—The new theatre in Herrin, recently completed at a cost of $40,000, was badly damaged by fire recently. Joe Berra, of Murphysboro, owner of the property, will reconstruct the building as soon as weather conditions permit.

Thomas Gray, who has been managing the Washington theatre at Granite City for the past five years, took over the management of the New Grand theatre a few days ago.

Messrs. Bastian Bros., Woolworth Building, New York, will supply you with any quantity of buttons, 5,000, 10,000, 20,000, or even smaller quantities. (Use official paper when ordering).

Proceeds of sale and donations to be sent direct to Alexander Brown & Sons, Bankers, Baltimore. No money to be sent to Messrs. Bastian Bros. for buttons. The buttons are sold from 5 cents upwards.

More Co-operation Guaranteed

THAT the National Anti-Misframe League has taken its place permanently in the Motion Picture industry is an assured fact. We have had this demonstrated by letters which we have published in the past from some of the leading film exchanges. This co-operation is going ahead rapidly as will be seen from the letters published below.

M. H. Hoffman of the Foursquare Pictures, Inc., has written us the following letter which speaks for itself:

M. H. HOFFMAN
729 Seventh Avenue, New York City.

December 31, 1917.

Mr. E. K. Gillett,
MOTION PICTURE NEWS, INC.,
729 Seventh Avenue,
New York City.

DEAR MR. GILLETT: Your letter of December 26, relative to the National Anti-Misframe League has had my attention. I want to say in reply that all of our film is carefully gone over each and every day and any misframes and poor patches are immediately remedied.

We also take special care to see that the film is clean at all times as your League requests.

You will notice from the above that, though we will co-operate at all times, there is nothing more that can be done with our film in this line.

Wishing you success for the coming year, I am

Very truly yours,
FOURSQUARE PICTURES, INC.
(Signed) M. H. Hoffman.

Further evidence of this co-operation is shown by the letter printed below from A. S. Kane of the Select Pictures Corporation. Mr. Kane has done more than merely write to the League guaranteeing his co-operation and help. He has written a letter which has gone out to all the branches of the Select Pictures Corporation, calling the attention of the exchange managers to the League and insisting upon their co-operation locally.

SELECT PICTURES CORPORATION
729 Seventh Avenue, New York City.

January 7, 1918.

MOTION PICTURE NEWS, INC.,
729 Seventh Avenue,
New York, N. Y.

Attention Mr. E. Kendall Gillett, Secretary and Treasurer.

GENTLEMEN: With regard to your letter of December 7, we are pleased to co-operate with you and the National Anti-Misframe League. The attached circular letter to our branches will give you some of our ideas along this subject.

Very truly yours,
SELECT PICTURES CORPORATION.
(Signed) A. S. Kane,
General Manager.

The following letter was sent out to all branches of the Select Pictures Corporation:

SELECT PICTURES CORPORATION
729 Seventh Avenue, New York City.

January 7, 1918.

TO ALL BRANCHES:

GENTLEMEN: Doubtless you are aware of the existence of the National Anti-Misframe League which was started by the MOTION PICTURE NEWS some time ago.

This splendid movement was inaugurated by the NEWS for the purpose of eradicating the following evils:

Misframe bad patches,
Punch holes,
Receipt of films without bands,
Film pinned together,
Careless inspection,
Oil soaked film,
Important scenes missing.

At present there are six hundred loyal members of this League who have pledged themselves to do everything within their power to remedy the above conditions. They are reporting promptly to the exchange managers when film is received in bad condition—whether film comes direct from exchange or from another exhibitor. This information is valuable to you, as it gives you an excellent check on the work of your inspectors. It also throws the spot light on the careless operator, etc.

We want all Select exhibitors to keep us informed should they receive one of our productions not in perfect condition. Therefore, you must co-operate with the members of the League in every way possible to support them in their commendable efforts.

Select stands squarely behind any move which has for its object the general uplift of the industry. The League and the MOTION PICTURE NEWS deserve our fullest co-operation—and they must receive it.

Very truly yours,
SELECT PICTURES CORPORATION.
_____, _____,
Sales Manager.

In the case of the two exchange managers whose letters are printed above, as well as in the case of those who have written us previously, and whose letters have been printed, it has been stated that whenever just complaints can be made by the members of the League it is the hope of the exchange managers that they will write immediately to the head office of the exchange in question and make their complaints. This can also be done through the headquarters of the League in the office of MOTION PICTURE NEWS if the members of the League prefer.

E. K. GILLETT.

Equipment Operating — Projection — Questions Answered

The Regulation of the Rays

in Cinematographic Projection Systems

IN spite of the extensive amount of experimental work on the optics of motion picture projection, the subject still seems to be in a state of vexed confusion in so far as the average operator is concerned, and in the various experimental endeavors to ascertain "where the light ray crosses," and to establish other points relative to the refracting action of the projector optical system, some fundamental points have been overlooked which are of capital importance from the viewpoint of efficiency, or, in other words, the utilization of the greatest possible proportion of the available light source in the formation of the screen image.

The study of projector optics is complicated by the fact that the condenser lens system is uncorrected, and hence its performance is hampered by a severe amount of aberration, and it is of importance to note that a corrected condenser system is a requisite item in any scheme for really improving the performance and efficiency of the motion picture projector. In view of the extensive aberration of the condenser system it is difficult, if not impossible, to exactly trace the paths of the rays from the condenser to the aperture or the objective, but some fundamental relationships between objective and condensers can be traced without consideration of the refracting effects of any of the lenses, which comprise the projector optical system.

To derive these relationships it is necessary to fall back upon geometrical optics and to consider the relationship of an object on one side of a lens with respect to its image on the other side, after the manner of the noted theorist, Dr. E. Abbe. If, from a plane object perpendicular to the axis on one side of the lens, there is reproduced, point for point, a plane image perpendicular to the axis on the other side of that lens, the object space and the image space are said to be in collinear relationship, and we can use this assumption as the basis of geometrical diagrams whereby to illustrate the manner in which the passage of light rays from object to image is regulated by any intervening optical system.

In the case of the motion picture projector the film aperture is the object and the screen picture is the image, and we have to see whether anything intervenes to prevent every point of the object (or aperture) from being represented within the geometrical limits of the image (or screen picture). We know from observation that every point in the object is reproduced in the image in everyday motion picture projection, but we have on the present occasion to extend our geometrical inquiry and determine if every point in the image receives as much illumination as may possibly be derived from the customary light source and optical system of the cine projector.

To ascertain this we have again to fall back upon the teachings of Abbe, and to discover what parts of the projecting machine or its optical system cut off, or intercept, any part of the light rays in their passage from the light source to the projected image on the screen. The most direct way of securing this information will naturally be by passing light through the optical system and then looking through the system from various points of the image field. We will then find out very readily what are the limitations imposed upon the light rays traversing the system.

Every optical system must present some limiting boundary to the rays which it can transmit, as the simplest example of which may be cited the edges of a simple lens. When we look through a centered system of lenses we note that the diameter of the bundle of rays which can traverse that system is regulated at various points by the edges of the lens mountings, by diaphragms, etc. The smallest opening through which the light passes in traversing an optical system is known as the "aperture stop," and it follows geometrically that this aperture stop must represent the widest cross-section of the bundle of rays which can traverse the system.

In the case of a double photographic objective, with a diaphragm between the two components, we note some other factors which can regulate the rays in passing through the system. When we stop down a double objective (with diaphragm between the components) and look at the diaphragm through the front component, we see a virtual image of the diaphragm opening which is situated somewhat back of the actual plane of the diaphragm. The image is virtual because the diaphragm is closer to the front component than its principal focal length. Reversing the process, and regarding the diaphragm through the rear component of the lens we see a similar virtual image of the stop which is located somewhat to the front of the diaphragm plane.

These two virtual images of the stop (seen through the front and back elements of the lens) were termed by Abbe the "entrance-pupil" and the "exit-pupil" of a lens system, and some of their properties are as follows:

As each pupil is the image of the other regarded through the complete lens, they are conjugate to one another, and as both the "entrance-pupil" and the "exit-pupil" are images of the diaphragm opening (or stop) it follows, of course, that all rays which pass through the stop must pass through the pupils. Of importance to our present inquiry is the fact that the center of the entrance-pupil is the center of perspective of the object space and the center of the exit-pupil is the center of perspective of the image space. With the positions of the pupils ascertained we can, therefore, show geometrically what are the boundaries of the object and image spaces as regulated by the stops in the optical system under examination.

When, now, we regard the light traversing a projector optical system from a point in front of the lens, it becomes apparent that the machine aperture is the smallest stop in the system and therefore limits the diameter of the bundle of image-forming rays which can enter the objective. As the business of projecting the pictures consists, however, of reproducing this aperture (as object) upon the screen, we cannot consider the machine aperture as a stop with respect to the action of the objective lens.

Assuming the use of a conventional objective of good quality, which has no diaphragm between its components, we, therefore, see that the diaphragms of this objective are the edges of the lens mount at each end. The image of the front (end towards the screen) rim of the lens mount regarded through the back component of the lens is therefore the entrance-pupil of the objective, while the image of the rear (end towards film) rim of the lens mount is the exit pupil of this objective. In a compound lens of this type, with no intervening diaphragms, the entrance- and exit-pupils are, as a matter of fact, images of each other and interchangeable. We will therefore be sufficiently accurate in the present demonstration if we designate as entrance-pupil the front component of the projection lens, and as exit-pupil the rear component of the same lens, when the lens is in place and focused for projecting pictures.

As we propose to trace the origin of the rays which are effective in illuminating the object, we have next to decide upon what we will term the light source, and the light source will evidently be the illuminant as seen through the projector optical system. When we look through the optical system of a motion picture projector with the light passing in the usual manner, we see as the light-source, the bright front surface of the forward condenser lens, or at least some portion of the same. In the present geometrical inquiry, we therefore term the bright front surface of the forward condenser the light-source, and are concerned with its position (or distance) and area, but not at all concerned with its refracting properties and aberrations.

Coming now to a practical case, we see in Fig. 1 a projector optical system consisting of a light source S, the machine aperture A and the objective O. We now require to find out if the aperture A (or object to be projected) is receiving all the light which it is possible to direct upon it from the source S. We said that the center of perspective of the object space was at the center of the entrance-pupil, and as the object (or aperture A) must be illuminated before its image can be projected by the objective O, we have to regard the light-source S from the center of the entrance-pupil P, and see if it subtends a sufficient angle at the pupil center P to completely cover the object to be projected (the aperture A) with light. This is ascertained geometrically, as shown, by drawing lines from the pupil center P, which touch the edges of the object (or aperture A) and are prolonged until they meet the light source S. If these lines meet the light source, as in the drawing, then the objective O is receiving the largest bundle of light which can possibly pass through the aperture.

Suppose, that with the distances, dimensions, etc., of the objective, the aperture and the source remaining the same, we move the light source somewhat further back from the aperture A to a point designated S′ in Fig. 1. When, now, we follow the course of the lines we have drawn from the center of the pupil P and touching the sides of the aperture A, we see that no matter how far backward these lines are produced they do not meet the light source in its new position at S′. It is, therefore, now apparent

(as indicated by the shading) that the light source in its more distant position S′ no longer completely fills the aperture A with light. We see at once, therefore, that in order to fill the aperture A with light, and thus transmit to the lens the largest bundle of rays which the aperture will allow to pass, we must either increase the area of the source at S′ or restore it to its original position at S. As it appears upon consideration to be in no way advisable to increase the size of the source (condensers), it is clear that in order to utilize as much light as possible we must advance the source to a point where its margin subtends at least as large an angle at the center of the entrance pupil (P) as does the object to be projected (the aperture A).

A study of Fig. 1 will clearly show that a considerable loss in illumination results from placing the condensers at too great a distance from the aperture of the projector, but this point seems to have been generally overlooked, with the result that most all the tables of condenser distances published to date represent a very poor utilization of the available light source. In so far as we are aware Mr. J. A. Orange was the first to point this fact out, in his paper on "Optic Projection," which we recently reprinted.

The effect of too great a distance between the light source and aperture (as at Fig. 1) is the same as if we reduced the dimensions of the source to the diameter 2d, and the only benefit derived from such procedure is a more even intensity distribution at the screen. (See the curves reproduced with Mr. Orange's paper.)

A further proof that the aperture is not evenly illuminated when the source is at too great a distance is the existence, when projecting, of a circular image of the light source at some distance in front of the projection objective. This has incorrectly been termed an "aerial image" by some writers, and is stated by J. A. Orange to act as a stop which limits the cone of rays proceeding to the screen. As both of these terms are a bit misleading it will be well to comment briefly upon the matter. This so-called "aerial image" is sometimes seen upon the revolving shutter blades and may be readily located by exploring the region in front of the objective with a piece of paper, so it is apparent that it is not an aerial (or virtual) image but a real image, and we have a right to assume that it is the conjugate representation of the incomplete illumination of the aperture A. It acts as a stop, as Mr. Orange asserts, but it would hardly be proper to call it a stop, as it merely shows the limits of the bundle of image-forming rays with a certain arrangement of the light source, while with a different arrangement of the light source but the same arrangement of objective and aperture there would be no diaphragming effect at that point. We have seen that if the distance is too great between aperture and light source the aperture, instead of being completely covered by the direct (and most intense) rays from the source, will be illuminated in a manner similar to (b) Fig. 1, and the circular disc of light just ahead of the objective, therefore represents the resulting aperture illumination as shown by (b).

The practical operator will inquire why it is that if the spot more than covers the aperture even in the case of too great a source distance, we have any right to assume that the light intensity is not equal all over the aperture. That such is the case is apparent, however, from the circular image ahead of the lens, and the reason is that the edges of what appears to be a generous sized spot will be formed of scattered light when the source is at too great a distance from the aperture. By decreasing the distance between light source and aperture the entire area of the condenser can be utilized, and this is one of the first points to be considered by those who seek to increase the efficiency of the motion picture projector.

When we undertake to view the light source from the margins of the image field (or edges of the screen picture) we see that in order to have limiting illumination (the utmost that can be derived from a source of given dimensions and brightness) at all points of the screen, the requirements are even more strict than the requirement of passing to the objective the largest possible bundle of rays. The limits of space prevent us from extending our investigation to the projection screen on the present occasion, but we shall return to the subject in the near future.

Operator's Inquiries

WE would draw attention to a special column which starts, under the above title, in this week's issue, and which will hereafter be a regular feature of the Projection Department.

As a glance through the current budget of inquiries and replies will show, the new column will supply the answers to such inquiries as may be very briefly replied to, and therefore do not warrant the use of extensive space in the Projection Department.

It is not to be thought, however, that lengthy inquiries will not receive our attention, for, as a matter of fact, the more detailed or complete a correspondent's inquiry is, the more extensive will be the consideration it receives, and the more complete will be the answer, if necessary to the thorough elucidation of the problem.

New or important items and questions submitted to the Projection Department will, as heretofore, be printed and commented upon in the leading pages, while the special column of answers to Operators' Inquiries will provide ready assistance to the operators or managers who are confronted by some minor difficulty, or who have written in haste without providing sufficient information.

It is our aim to render speedy assistance to all correspondents who are confronted with difficulties in the operating-room, and we can point with pride to the fact that we do not allow our correspondence to "snow us under" to the extent that we are always three weeks or a month behind time.

Operators Inquiries

P. E. EVERTS, Marshalltown, Ia., "Would the Power Company put a new bearing in a main frame casting that is worn out? The machine is a No. 6."

REPLY: Try them and see. Their address is 90 Gold Street, New York City. Some repair shops would doubtless undertake to re-bush the worn bearings.

E. WOOD, Mattoon, Ill., "What is the most suitable glass to use in port-holes? I have tried everything from glass to mica but it always throws my picture out of focus."

REPLY: The most suitable glass to use in port-holes would be optical crown with the surfaces ground plane, which is an expensive proposition. Some claim to have secured satisfactory definition through selected pieces of plate glass, but we were never able to secure the utmost in definition without recourse to accurately surfaced homogeneous (optical) glass.

G. M. HOWARD, Saginaw, Mich., "I have tried a piece of copper ground down to the shape of a carbon, and with the size I used in the lower carbon-holder could get a brilliant blue-white light, but the copper melts. Could I in my experiments get away from this melting? It can be done some way."

REPLY: The correspondent is correct in his last premise; it can be done and it has been done. We have seen arc electrodes which appeared to be made of copper, and which would, moreover, stand the heat of the arc without melting at an unduly rapid rate, although the electrode must melt, or boil, at the tip prior to volatilizing. Although we have not been able to secure any information as to the constituency or the manufacturer of the electrodes we saw, it is safe to say that they are not pure copper, but an alloy of copper and some other elements. The spectrum of the arc produced between such electrodes showed scores of iron lines.

A. W. LANDMESSER, Hartford, Conn., "Does the light increase or decrease when the machine is speeded up? What effect has it on the picture? The amperes at the arc to be the same in both cases."

REPLY: The answer to this question, which has been raised several times of late, should be perfectly obvious. We have a shutter with a given number of openings revolving in a beam of light of given intensity, and we require to find what is the integral effect of the successive light flashes which occur in unit time. It is obvious that if the shutter is revolving slowly there will be a certain number of light flashes of comparatively long duration in the time interval we select as unit. When the shutter is speeded up the flashes are of shorter duration, but there are more light flashes within the unit time interval and the sum of the intensities of either series of flashes will approximately equal the other. The manner in which rapidly succeeding light flashes integrate themselves upon the retina of the eye is of fundamental importance in the study of flicker.

F. L. McKIEL, Tyler, Texas, "Why do my lenses on Power 6 A machines get out of focus so frequently? The tubes fit good and tight but still they get out of focus 3 or 4 times a day. Where does the light cross after leaving condenser?"

REPLY: Maybe it is not the lenses that get out of focus so persistently. If, for instance, the tension-shoes are not set to give sufficient pressure, the film will be travelling past the aperture in a different plane from time to time. In increasing gate tension do not make the same too severe, as is frequently done, for then damage to the film and rapid wearing of the intermittent will result. Although the lens tubes appear to fit tight in the focussing jackets it is possible, and probable, that the lost motion is in the focussing jackets. Then the vibration of the machine can cause the shift in focal distance. It may be found that the focus is being destroyed by oil splashed onto the rear component of the objective.

In general, the light rays from the condenser are converged just ahead of the front element of the projection lens.

E. M. GIBSON, Washburn, Me., "Will you please give me a formula for a non-freezing slide ink?"
